Church Pension Fund Proposes Boost in Assessments

The Lower Income from Investments Makes It Necessary According to Its Statement

By Sara Dill

New York:—The continued downward trend in interest rates has compelled the trustees of the Church Pension Fund to take action toward increasing the rate of pension assessments from 7½ percent to 10 percent in order to compensate for lower interest earnings, according to a special report just released over the signature of Bishop Cameron J. Davis, president of the fund. This action which is to be effective January 1, 1947, subject to the approval of the General Convention of 1946 was taken by unanimous vote of the trustees at a special meeting called recently to consider the problem. As pointed out in the introduction of the report "Any financial institution can be successfully administered only if its income is sufficient to balance its disbursements. In the case of the Church Pension Fund, the two sources of income are the interest earned on its assets and the pension assessments payable in accordance with its rules. The total of these two must be sufficient to balance its pension obligations, not merely for any particular year but during the entire existence of the fund. Its promises extend to its potential future beneficiaries as well as to its present beneficiaries. It is for this reason that the Church Pension Fund is administered on an actuarial reserve basis."

The report, which reviews the background of the fund, its history in recent years, and the current situation, traces the steps which have previously been taken by the trustees in line with the steady downward trend over a long period of years in interest yields procurable on high-grade investments. There is a chart appended to the report illustrating this trend since 1917, when the fund started. It is pointed out that, at the time the fund started, many of the larger insurance companies were selling annuity contracts on a 4 percent interest basis but that now their annuity contracts are being issued on a 2½ percent or 2 percent interest basis. The Church Pension Fund has, over the years, reduced its interest assumption from 4 percent in 1917, to 3½ in 1938, to 3¼ in 1944, and now plans a further reduction to a 2¾ basis beginning in 1947. Up to the present time however, the trustees have been able, by drawing on the fund's surplus, to avoid increasing the assessment rate beyond the original 7½ percent payable by every parish, mission and other ecclesiastical organization throughout the Church. It is stated that a further reduction to a 2¾ interest basis, which the trustees feel is essential for the future safety of the fund would require the use of substantially more than the present surplus of $1,889,186 unless the assessment rate is also increased at the same time to 10 percent. A comparison with other ministerial pension systems shows that, with one exception where an increase is now being contemplated, their assessment rates are higher than 7½ percent. That of the Presbyterian Church, U.S.A. and of a number of others is now 11 percent and has been for some time.

Reviewing the investment portfolio the report outlines the principles which the Church Pension Fund has followed and which the trustees believe should be followed in administering a pension system of this sort "upon the integrity of whose promises thousands of present and future beneficiaries should be able to rely with confidence." It is stated that no single investment of the fund is in default as to interest or dividend income and that if the entire investment portfolio should now be liquidated the overall result, including accumulated profits and losses on all sales of securities since the inception of the fund, would show a substantial profit. The average rate of interest earned on the fund's assets has however been steadily declining in line with general economic conditions and the report states that it is the opinion of the finance committee that "any substantial increase in the rate of interest which will be earned on its invested assets cannot be safely anticipated in the predictable future."

"It follows therefore," the report continues, "that the only other means of balancing the fund's future obligations on the basis of its present promises is to increase the income derived from the pension assessments. The alternative would be to eliminate the present extra benefits and decrease the basic promises of the fund. In this report it is assumed that the Church would not wish the trustees either to reduce the present extra benefits or to decrease the basic pension promises if that can be avoided."

Although the trustees have, under their charter powers and in accordance with the recommendations of the insurance department of the state of New York under whose supervision the fund is administered, voted to reduce the interest basis and increase the rate of pension assessments effective January 1, 1947, they took this action subject to the approval of the General Convention of 1946.

Washington:—As soon as a plane lands on a carrier (cover of December 27) the crew goes below to report to their unit. A unit is a very closely knit organization with the men, through long and hazardous association, having come to consider each other brothers. The two seated have not been on this particular mission but the other three in the foreground have been, and are reporting on what happened. The crewman who is talking is obviously still excited and very tired. One of the other men has just lit his first cigarette. After reporting to members of their own unit they go before a specially trained group where just what happened is recorded. This is one of a series of combat pictures taken by Fons Iannelli, who was a member of the special navy photo unit directed by Captain Edward J. Steichen. As stated in our last number, we believe that Mr. Iannelli caught, as words cannot, something of what young men went through during the war which it is well for all of us to keep in mind.

GERMANS PROTEST MOVES AGAINST CLERGY

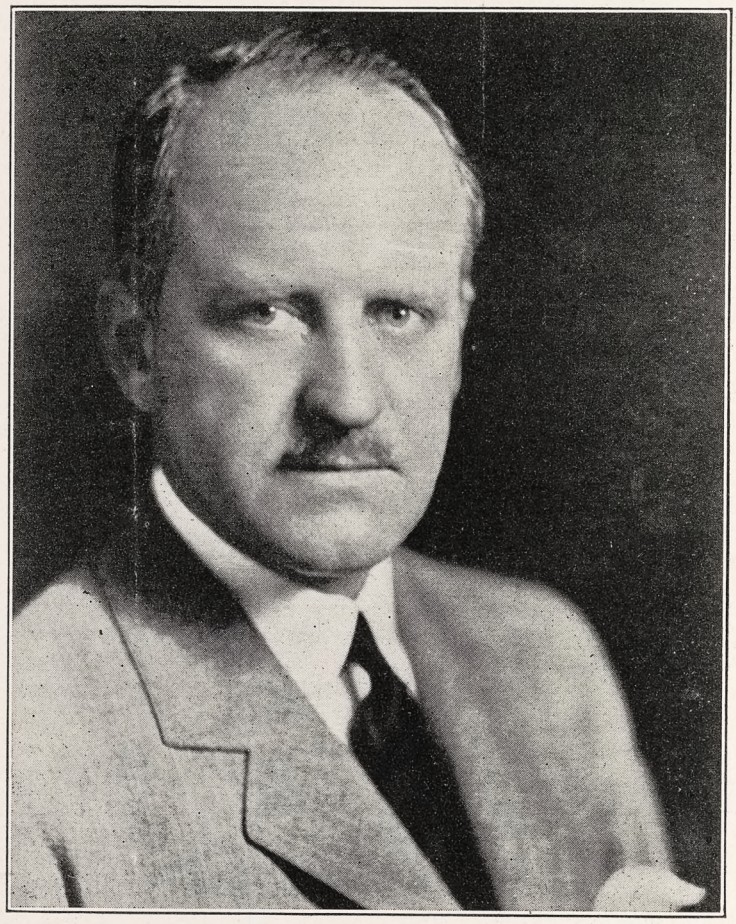
By EWART E. TURNER
Religious News Service Correspondent

Frankfurt, Germany (by wireless)—The first major crisis in the American Zone of Occupation between leaders of the Evangelical church of Germany and U. S. military authorities is expected to develop in the near future unless the Army changes its policy toward former members of the Nazi party.

American directives on the subject, which are much sharper than those promulgated by the French, British and Russians, demand the removal of all persons who participated actively in the Nazi party.

Catholic and Protestant churches in Germany have officially protested to the American Military Government against alleged injustices done to thousands by wholesale mandatory removals rather than by judging cases individually.

Thus far, Military Government officials have recommended that 270 Protestant clergy be dismissed, basing their action on returns from a standard questionnaire submitted to all Germans. Church disciplinary boards already have removed more than 100 churchmen, but have refused to take action on certain others.



This policy of the boards has been supported by Bishop Theophilus Wurm, president of the Evangelical Church of Germany, who was an outstanding anti-Nazi. Bishop Wurm has insisted that unless the ordination vows of the clergy were broken, they cannot be dismissed for political activity.

The Evangelical Church has set up its own standards of judgment for dismissal, covering two main points: (1) Did the pastor belong to the German Christians, the pro-Nazi group within the church which assisted Hitler; and (2) Did the pastor seek a merger of the Nazi ideology with the Christian.

Even these two points, however, are not held to rigidly by Bishop Wurm and other church officials if there is reason for belief that the pastor has been "converted" and has since conducted his ministry along acceptable lines. In fact, several pastors in the American zone whose removal have been sought have outstanding anti-Nazi records dating back to 1939.

As the responsibility for denazification rests with the Office of Education and Religion, the crisis is expected to develop if the higher echelons tire of the seemingly slow progress the negotiations with church boards are making and start arresting clergymen.

Church officials think the impending disaster can be averted if religious and educational officials are given revised directives allowing them to deal with individuals, not categories. They then could implement the change by resolutely removing those pastors whose records were, and still are, bad.

Bradford B. Locke, the executive head of the Church Pension Fund, died suddenly at his home in Princeton, N. J., on January 6, at the age of 55

ARCHBISHOP TO VISIT THE CONVENTION

New York:—The Archbishop of Canterbury, the Rt. Rev. Geoffrey Francis Fisher, is to visit the United States and address the General Convention which opens in Philadelphia on September 10. He comes at the invitation of the Presiding Bishop. He is also to attend a meeting of the General Synod of the Church of England in Canada.

Kagawa Not Allowed to Preach By American Officer

Story in Servicemen's Paper Accused Him of Whipping Up Hatred Against the Americans

By Richard T. Baker

Tokyo (wireless to RNS): — A scheduled Christmas sermon by Toychiko Kagawa, noted Japanese Protestant leader, to American servicemen here has been cancelled by the local commanding officer. Reason given for the move is that the GIs should hear an American chaplain.

Posters announcing the sermon had been hung in American billets and offices, but they were hastily removed.

Although the sermon had been scheduled by Chaplain Paul W. Yinger, formerly with Congregationalist headquarters in Washington, the cancellation was issued by higher army officials and is thought to represent the policy of the supreme command.

The ban on Kagawa followed an article by Bernard Rubin in The Stars and Stripes, the Army's daily paper, which revived anti-American statements attributed to Kagawa during the war. In the alleged statements Kagawa condemned American bombings and "savagery comparable to the lowest cannibalism."

Rubin's story also accused Kagawa of whipping up racial hatred against Americans as well as having had questionable relations with Loshio Kodama, a war profiteer now in jail under charges of being a war criminal.

Also listed among Rubin's charges is the assertion that Kagawa went to the Philippines to aid the Japanese invasion. A spokesman for Kagawa denied this, however, declaring that Kagawa was invited there by Filipino Christians but that Japanese army authorities refused him passage.

While disavowing any political ambitions, Kagawa has been prominent in teachers' and farmers' unions as well as the Cooperative Party recently established. It is thought in some quarters here that his political activities may have been instrumental in contributing to the ban on his scheduled sermon.

Kagawa also is opposed in some quarters here for his strong support of the emperor as well as for his closeness to the imperial household and his anti-Communist views. He was an advisor to the first post-surrender cabinet of Prince Higashi-Kuni, the emperor's brother-in-law. He also has been instructing the imperial household on Christianity and cooperatives.

Meanwhile it can be stated that Christmas festivities here did more to cement goodwill between the conquerors and the conquered than anything that has happened since American troops came to Japan last summer. Celebrating the first Noel in five years the city was decorated with greenery and bright lights and both the Yanks and the Japanese participated in parties and religious services. Most striking decoration in the entire city was a 2,100-light, forty foot sign on the headquarters building which reflected its "Merry Christmas" greeting into the moat around the emperor's palace.

Although GIs received their quota of turkey, civilians had less to eat but that failed to stop youngsters from shouting "Merry Christmas" in the streets and getting chocolate and gum in return.

Three renditions of Handel's Messiah were scheduled, the first being held Christmas Eve with 250 Americans and Japanese forming the chorus, accompanied by the Nippon symphony orchestra. On Christmas Eve the city rang with the sound of carols. One of the most impressive gatherings was the gutted Holy Trinity Church where a huge bonfire was built around which members of both countries gathered to sing.

Services even were held at Sugamo Prison where the war criminals are held. American units there had turkey but the prisoners had to be content with their usual rations.

Biggest party for children was held at 11th corps headquarters where 600 youngsters and civilian workers were entertained. Soap boxes were placed in all army quarters for the collection of gifts for children.

SAFE ARRIVALS IN CHINA

New York:—The Presiding Bishop received a cable on December 26 informing him of the safe arrival in China of Bishop Craighill, Bishop William P. Roberts and the Rev. Claude L. Pickens.

AMERICAN-SOVIET FRIENDSHIP

New York:—The Rev. Richard Morford, for the past three years the executive secretary of the United Christian Council for Democracy, resigned on December 27 to accept a position as director of the National Council for American-Soviet Friendship. Mr. Morford was listed in the 1945 WITNESS honor roll for the able leadership he has given the organizations affiliated with the UCCD in social action. The executive secretaries of the Methodist Federation for Social Service, the Church League for Industrial Democracy and the Social Action Committee of the Evangelical-Reformed Church were named a committee to find a successor to Mr. Morford for the UCCD position.

WILLIAM B. SPERRY GOES TO DETROIT

Detroit: — The Rev. William B. Sperry, rector of St. Martin's, Pittsfield, Mass., and an editor of THE WITNESS has accepted the position of director of social relations of the Council of Churches of this city. He begins his new work on January 16.

CHURCH COMMITTEE TAKES ACTION

Gary, Ind.:—The social relations department of the diocese of Northern Indiana, the Rev. James E. Foster, chairman, has issued the following statement relative to strikes. "The public welfare is challenged by the current struggle between capital and labor. The facts are: 1. The take-home pay of many workers was sharply reduced after VJ day. 2. Some workers have struck and others expect to do so. 3. The corporations claim that wage rates cannot be raised unless prices are increased. 4. President Truman has said that 'industry as a whole can afford substantial wage increases without price increases.' Financial statistics support this statement.

"If the American economy is to function successfully it is imperative that these strikes be settled quickly, that wage rates be raised, that there be no general increase in prices.

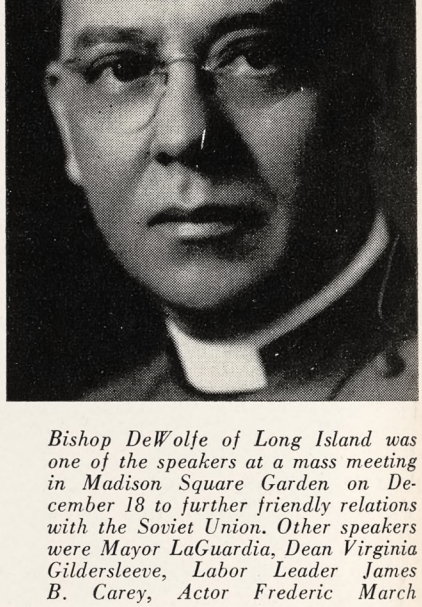
"We suggest that these facts be made clear to your congregations and in your communities, that churchmen and citizens be urged to express their interest, that labor unions be advised of whatever support can be rallied for them in this struggle, that you and your congregation make your views known to the President, to your representatives in Congress, and in the public press.

"Our Presiding Bishop Tucker has said: 'The highest morality is that which acts in the public interest.' It is clearly the public interest which should be paramount in this matter and now is a time to act."

CONFERENCE ON THE MINISTRY

Buffalo, N. Y.:—The Rev. Gordon E. Gillett, youth director of the diocese of Long Island, is to lead a conference on the ministry, to be held at St. Paul's Cathedral House on Washington's Birthday. The meeting will follow the annual corporate communion of men and boys of the diocese.

YOUTH CONVENTION IS HELD



Philadelphia:—The annual youth convention of the diocese of Pennsylvania was held here at the Church of the Holy Apostles and the Mediator on January 5, with the Rev. William Crittendon, head of national youth work, the headliner. Others on the program were the Rev. B. J. Rudderow of the provincial commission on youth; the Rev. Louis E. Fifer and Miss Julia E. Hill of the diocesan youth commission, and Bishop Hart. A feast of lights was held in the evening with the young people's choirs of St. Augustine's and St. Matthew's leading the singing.

BERKELEY IS ACCREDITED

New Haven, Conn.: — The Berkeley Divinity School was accredited at the December meeting of the commission on accreditation of the American Association of Theological Schools. It is now one of six seminaries of the Episcopal Church to be so accredited.

SECRETARY OF FILM GROUP

New York: — Paul Heard, navy officer, has been appointed executive head of the newly organized Protestant film commission. The board also voted to set a million dollar goal for a revolving fund to provide religious motion pictures, advise the industry and raise the standards of presentation. The officers of the organization are Rome A. Betts, secretary of the American Bible Society, president; S. Franklin Mack, secretary of the board of foreign missions of the Presbyterian Church, vice-president; Mrs. Norman Vincent Peale of the United Council of Church Women, secretary; Kinsey Merritt of the public relations department of the Railway Express Agency, treasurer.

Bishop DeWolfe of Long Island was one of the speakers at a mass meeting in Madison Square Garden on December 18 to further friendly relations with the Soviet Union. Other speakers were Mayor LaGuardia, Dean Virginia Gildersleeve, Labor Leader James B. Carey, Actor Frederic March

NEW PARISH HOUSE IS PLANNED

Huntsville, Ala.:—The Church of the Nativity here, which is the oldest church in northern Alabama, is to have a new parish house. Gifts of over $50,000 have just been received from Mrs. J. B. F. Herreshoff and Mrs. A. F. Walker, both of Atlanta, Ga., in memory of their father, Dr. James L. Ridley, onetime local physician. The new building will replace a long inadequate store and loft structure. The present rector, the Rev. Randolph R. Claiborne, says that construction will start as soon as materials are available.

The Season of Light

"THE strange new light that nobody understands yet." This phrase, which the New Yorker recently used concerning atomic energy, is also a valuable description of Christianity. Power lies behind that light; the light is significant mainly as a manifestation of the power. So it is with the faith. "We beheld his glory"—it was glory because "the world was made by him"—power lay behind the glory.

For a thousand years, the theologians have been separating the power and the glory. They have laid the center of gravity in the glory that can be seen in the mind's eye and felt in the heart. Some have represented Christianity as an intellectual belief, some as an emotional faith. They have largely ignored the social power of the Christian community in the midst of which the glory has been manifest, and will be manifest. The power of God incarnate is manifested in his Church, when his spirit is upon her. Yet, says Canon Wedel in The Coming Great Church, the two doctrines forgotten by the great theologians are the doctrine of the Church and the doctrine of the spirit. When the power is forgotten, what becomes of the glory?

The Epiphany season is the season of the glory, the season of light. The very word epiphany, and the name the Eastern Orthodox use, theophany, refer to the wonder that breaks on our sight—"the strange new light that nobody understands yet." It calls forth wonder at a glory which has power behind it: as at Christ's baptism, the heavens open and God's voice thunders. This strange new light was apparent in the word-made-flesh who dwelt among us; it was given to the apostles; it has appeared repeatedly in vital periods of the Church's history; it is in our midst now, but the world does not see it because of our unwillingness and inability to reflect it.

Parsons may preach as they will about the light manifest this Epiphany; until it has exploded with glory in the midst of the congregation, it will not be seen. No exaggeration is too great for the power that is in our midst. Atomic energy pales beside it. If God be made man; if the Church is the body of God-made-man, indescribable power and glory dwells among us.

Our civilization is dying for lack of this social energy—"full of grace and truth"—which can transform torn lonely lives into one life that is the light of men. We cannot forthwith communicate it, for nobody understands it or will ever manipulate it. Our place, in Epiphany, is to wonder at this powerful, glorious light—to receive its power in our parish and community life, to see its glory in scripture, liturgy and song. It is there—strange and new as ever. One day it may explode again.

"Quotes"

I AM NOT a Christian any more than Pontius Pilate was but I am ready to admit, after studying the world of human misery for sixty years, that I see no way out of the world's troubles but the way Jesus would have found had he undertaken the work of a modern, practical statesman.

—George Bernard Shaw

Let There Be Light!

EPIPHANY inspires us to some vagrant thoughts about darkness and light. We have been wondering whether Isaiah didn't mean us when he wrote, "For behold, darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people." Surely there seems to be a conspiracy of silence—of darkness—against the people these days. In three quite different fields we have sensed it. General Motors tells us that none shall look at its books lest such action destroy "free enterprise." What has free enterprise to hide, we naively ask, when we are informed as a reason for this that profits have nothing to do with wages and yet, contradictorily, we are adjured that prices will have to be raised if wages are to be increased? What sort of Alice - in - Wonderland talk is this? How about a little light for the people?

The foreign ministers of the Big Three come together in Moscow—in gross darkness. To be sure the results seem to be, in the main, good. But since it was all done in the name of us, the people, we can't help being curious as to what took place. Who of us, the people, yielded what—and why? Is there aught that must needs be covered up?

Our Church Commission on Approaches to Unity has been meeting these many months and no one has ventured to raise the curtain of darkness that surrounds it. Surely nothing devious could be going on under such holy auspices! Yet why aren't we the people told of the transactions that take place with our fellow Christians?

Several years ago the daily proceedings of the City Council of New York were broadcast. Then the spotlight of radio that was thrown on the deliberations of our city fathers was abruptly cut off. No one knows why, but it was whispered that the "people" had begun to lose respect for their chosen representatives as they listened to their lively and often unintentionally humorous discussions.

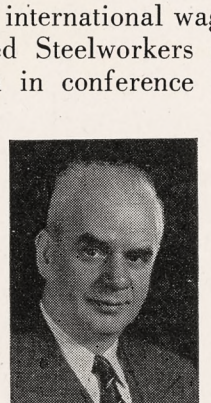
THE WITNESS is for open covenants openly arrived at. It feels the people have the right and ought to know and follow in full light what is being decided in their name—and for their ostensible benefit. This holds in our business economy, in our relations with other nations and in the Church. Suspicion and doubt spawn in darkness. Let there be light!



Steel Strike

By

JOHN G. RAMSAY

Presbyterian Layman and Staff Representative of the United Steelworkers

"THE strike shall commence on January 14, 1946 at 12:01 A.M." The international wage policy committee of the United Steelworkers of America reached this decision in conference in Pittsburgh, Pa., on December 11, 1945.

PHIL MURRAY

Many are the questions being raised in the minds of the public. This will be a strike which will be the largest in magnitude in the history of the United States of America. It will affect us all. The public has a right to know the facts and reasoning in this labor-management controversy.

Who is this wage policy committee? By what right do they set a strike date that will stop production of the industrial giant Steel?

The wage policy committee is made up of men from the steel mills from all sections of the United States and Canada. They are elected delegates from the local unions of steel towns meeting with the international executive board of the union. The members of the international executive board are the officers of the union and the thirty-nine district directors. These representatives of the union are elected by a referendum vote of the entire membership of the union. They are delegated with authority to speak and act for the union.

Besides the democratic process within the union itself, there is the added mandate of the steelworkers throughout the nation in the recent strike vote. This vote was conducted by the National Labor Relations Board in conformity with provisions of the Smith-Connally labor disputes act. Close to 500,000 votes were cast by the steelworkers with a five to one majority voting to support a strike.

This great vote was cast in spite of a campaign on the part of many steel companies to keep down the size of the vote. Many steel companies refused to supply a list of eligible voters to the government and others refused to post official notice of the election in the plants. Almost without exception, steel management conducted a virtual "blitz" against the union on the false charge that it was violating agreements through the strike vote. While some steel companies cooperated to the extent of permitting balloting on the company premises, hundreds of them denied the government and their employees this convenience.

The lack of cooperation on the part of management shows clearly that while they were able to secure the Smith-Connally Act against labor's opposition, they were not sincere about having a democratic strike vote by their employees. The vote proved to the public that labor leadership does have the support of their membership on a strike issue.

Here are the facts leading up to the strike vote, and the setting of a strike date.

On August 18, 1945, President Truman issued executive order 9599. This order authorized unions and employers to agree upon wage increases of any amount without obtaining the approval of the War Labor Board subject only to the condition that increases are not to be used in whole or in part as a basis for seeking an increase in price ceilings.

In conformity with the union's contract with the steel companies and this executive order by the President of the United States, the international wage policy committee met on September 11, 1945 and formulated its demand for a wage increase of $2.00 per day and immediately requested collective bargaining conferences with the steel companies. This demand represented but a partial restoration of the wage cut the steelworkers have received as a result of loss in working time and downgrading of hourly wages.

The request of the United Steelworkers of America when presented to the many steel corporations, was met with an abrupt "No." Collective bargaining was not engaged in. The answer of the corporations was uniformly given within a few minutes — practically no counter offer has ever been made — simply an arrogant and provocative "No."

The Secretary of Labor, on November 3, addressed communications to the union and to the United States Steel Corporation asking them to resume collective bargaining with the assistance of a mediator to be appointed by the government. The union accepted. The corporation repeated its adamant "No."

The Secretary of Labor, on November 9, renewed his request to the United States Steel Corporation. The answer was the same cold "No."

It was ninety days after the union initiated collective bargaining with the steel corporations on the wage issue that the decision to set a strike date was made by the steelworkers, aluminum workers and iron ore miners, under the jurisdiction of the United Steelworkers of America.

The membership of the union made every effort to avoid taking strike action. They are endeavoring at all times to accomplish a peaceful settlement of this all-important issue.

Over 400,000 workers throughout the nation, in a secret ballot, have given their mandate—to strike in self-protection.

Each separate contract the union has signed with the corporations will be studied by the legal department under the direction of General Counsel, Lee Pressman. No local union will be authorized to vote or strike if it would be a breach of contract.

In a letter to President Philip Murray, Mr. Pressman says:

> "The union clearly maintained that all matters covered by the agreement except the issue of a general wage increase would be fixed for the full term of the agreement—until October 16, 1946. The issue of a general wage increase, however, under the agreement could be reopened for collective bargaining at any time prior to the termination date provided there would occur a change in the national wage policy. In the event the subject is reopened and in the course of collective bargaining the parties cannot agree—clearly the union would have a perfect right to strike on this issue.
> "To deny the union this right is to make meaningless the right of the union to reopen the matter of a general wage increase."

THERE is much more in this fight for a $2.00 per day wage increase for steelworkers. The national economy is at stake. "As steel goes, so goes the nation" is an old but not outworn economic slogan. President Philip Murray in his closing remarks to the wage policy committee said, "Our wage fight is to the national interest. The underlying motive that prompts us today is the welfare of the nation."

In a recent statement Mr. Murray also said, "The sharp slashing of the pay of American wage earners spells economic disaster for the American nation. We seek a wage increase to assure adequate earnings with which to provide for our families, to raise our purchasing power and that of the rest of the country—so that the national economy will have enough consuming power to keep the wheels of industry going."

In 1929 we had too much of our nation's money in the hands of too few of our people. Millions of our people were unemployed because they did not have the purchasing power to consume what they could produce. Labor is saying that this must not happen again. Are we to find again in this year of 1946 that we have too much of our nation's money in the hands of too few of our people?

Let us face the facts—they are hidden from an unsuspecting public. The financial ability of the steel industry to meet the wage demands of the union can be completely demonstrated. The following facts have not been refuted.

1. The profits of the steel industry, before taxes and during the five war years, 1940-1944, rose 276% over the peacetime level of 1935-1939—from $933 million to over 3 billion, five hundred million.

2. Profits after taxes, rose 113% during the war period—from $576 million to $1,000,225,000.

3. Open profits acknowledged in 1944 were $190,366,000. Concealed profits in 1944 were $271,165,000. This is a total profit of $407,531,000 after the payment of all taxes. The peacetime average for the industry was $115 million.

4. Tax refunds from the United States treasury, amounting to $149 million, or 29% more than peacetime profits, can be collected by the steel industry in 1946 if it breaks even.

5. The steel industry can thus meet the union's request for a $2.00 day wage increase and in 1946 still earn over $400 million in net profits after taxes—or 3½ times its peacetime average.

This inequitable distribution of the industry's earnings is not only an injustice to steelworkers; it is a threat to the post-war prosperity and security of America because the bulk of the nation's savings is not in the hands of the people who do the bulk of the consuming.

The steelworkers feel their demands are just, their cause is the cause of our nation. They will strike if they must. They are fighting for justice in sharing abundance and economic stability for all.

Competition or Cooperation?

by Herbert W. Prince

Rector at Lake Forest, Illinois

NOTHING is of more prominence right now in the Episcopal Church than the Reconstruction and Advance Fund, and nothing is of more importance than a critical appraisal of it. There should be as little timidity as restraint in subjecting the policy of the National Council to scrutiny by clergy and laymen.

In a project so unusual as a new beginning of Church work in international fields there can be no Christian justification for each separate denomination to commence rebuilding its lost work without regard to the work of other denominations in the same area—no justification, that is, in this new age in which we are living; no justification in this new day of the World Council of Churches. It is possible that, unknown to all the rest of us, the National Council has prepared the way for re-entry into China, Japan, and other overseas fields of service by consultation and arrangement with other Christian Churches or denominations. If so, well and good; but if not, then the rank and file of the Episcopal Church membership should have something to say and should declare its mind on the subject.

Are we as a Church to return to China and other lands and set up the same machinery as before for running an Anglican Church mission among the Chinese in the same areas as the Roman Catholics, Presbyterians, Methodists, and others without clearing the ground ahead of time in a sharing process which will prevent overlapping, rivalry and multiple administration?

Can the Christian Church in any of its parts conceivably think it is Christian any longer to persist in unilateral missions in lands where the work is reduced to zero and all of us have the chance of starting afresh? Or, along other lines, can any Christian Church defend any longer the abominable thesis that the converts of one denomination are clearly superior as Christians to the converts of another? Still further, dare we as Christians first, and denominationalists or churchmen second, insist on the continuance of a denominational Christianity in foreign lands, whose Christian history is in no way tied to the theology, doctrines and issues of the Reformation?

Looking at these questions from a Christian point of view first, last and altogether, it doesn't seem possible to come to any other conclusions than the following:

1. The Christian Churches are no longer justified in pursuing separate courses of action in the reconstruction of Christian work in foreign lands.
2. The Christian Churches must recognize the essential unity of spirit and purpose animating all of them, the membership and life of all members being imbued with similar Christian principles.
3. The Christian Churches must put the obligations of their common Christianity ahead of their loyalty to the particular branch or denomination.
4. The Episcopal Church membership demands that before any reconstruction or advance work is begun in China, Japan, the Philippines, India or any other field of service abroad, a thorough survey be made of the previous and present work of all Churches in those fields, and of the needs of those fields for western missionary service, supervision or aid; that as a result of such a survey Christian missionary service be offered and distributed in accordance with the needs and requests of native Christian Churches without overlapping, duplication, and demands of special privilege.

THE rejoinder will be made that the larger denominations are already raising large sums, far larger than our eight million, for the prosecution of their separate denominational work in these countries without relation to us or any other communion. This is unhappily true.

The answer is that every effort must be made to rectify this very bad start before actual denominational rivalry begins once more to entangle the Christianity of the new or young Churches of missionary lands. If Methodists, Presbyterians, Baptists and others have not taken the lead in pooling resources, workers and administration, then the honor of recommending this course belongs to us; and who among all Church leaders is in a better position to make the recommendation than the honored Presiding Bishop of the Episcopal Church, recently also President of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America! As a matter of fact, thirteen of the larger denominations and missionary boards have already agreed to combine their efforts and resources in presenting a single or united Protestant Christianity to Japan.

Another rejoinder will be that the Roman Catholic Church stands outside all schemes of unified Christian effort, whether at home or abroad, thereby wrecking all real designs for cooperation, federation and unity. That also, unhappily, is true.

Copyright 2020. Archives of the Episcopal Church / DFMS. Permission required for reuse and publication.

But it cannot and must not forever prevent the co-operating, federating or unifying efforts of all the rest of us, especially in this new day of reconstruction in devastated lands.

There is one way, and one only, which will in the end force the Roman Catholic Church to shift from its autocratic position of isolation, and that is a powerful combine of Anglican and Protestant churches of America, Britain and the Dominions working together in reconstruction and advance in all lands where such work is under consideration. Until that time comes the other Churches of Christendom have no alternative but to work out their own destiny, attempting to do the will of God.

Do the Churches and we in particular have such a responsibility to the past that the future is continually crippled by its inheritance? Must the dead hand of ancient differences rest so heavily upon the fluid present as to hold the Christian religion back when all else moves forward?

Above all other considerations today is that of a united Christian front to the world, for the world; if necessary against the world. The atomic age is here now and in our midst. There is one voice that can give hope and confidence to mankind for the future. It is the voice of united Christianity through the Churches.

We must speak to the governments and the nations as the custodian of the word of God—written, incarnate, the word of hope, of judgment, of redemption. Nothing less can save our world from corruption and despair. A divided Christendom and rival Churches have become the sin against the Holy Ghost—sin against the light.

People Come First

DAVID M. FIGART

IT IS conceded that prosperity depends on a solution of our distribution problem—which boils down to employment security. If men in industry have steady jobs, then men in transportation and the service industries will have steady jobs, farmers will sell their crops at profitable prices, shareholders will get a return on their investment, government will collect its revenue, capital will prosper. But if men in industry become unemployed, the whole structure topples.

We know that no matter how well a business is managed, there will be some unexpected interruptions in its operations. Fluctuation in demand is certain to characterize the years ahead, particularly after the present shortages are made up. How will management meet this situation? As now set up, it can do one of two things. It can keep its labor employed and accumulate inventories in the hope that any slackening in demand will be only temporary. If it guesses wrong, its last state is worse than its first. Or—it can lay off unneeded labor until demand recovers. But such unemployed labor loses its purchasing power; and the remaining employed labor gets frightened and starts a buyers' strike; and this leads to a concerted movement — perhaps unconscious— among the big corporations to curtail operations on a national scale, such as occurred in 1929 and the years following, and we'll be in another heart-breaking depression. No amount of good resolutions on the part of industry and labor and public bodies will prevent this happening.

But there is a way to prevent it—and that is by corporations accumulating reserves earmarked to carry labor through temporary periods of idleness, just as family heads accumulate savings for a rainy day. The responsibility of the corporation to its employees, largely deprived of economic liberty in a machine age, is of the same order as the responsibility of a man to his wife and family. A family head takes his bank savings, his insurance policies, everything he has, to feed and clothe and shelter his family when trouble comes. How logically this points to the need for the corporation to follow the same policy—that of accumulating reserves for the express purpose of taking up the shock of temporary interruptions in business by maintaining purchasing power in the community until the situation is corrected. And since misfortune never hits all businesses at the same time, you thus deal with the source of infection the moment it appears, and prevent an epidemic.

To point out to corporate management the need for such employment security reserves is not sufficient. Management must be given a compelling incentive to build them up. Tax exemption for employment security reserves would undoubtedly provide the needed incentive, particularly as labor and the public, knowing that management could accumulate such reserves without tax penalties, would insist on this insurance against a repetition of 1929.

Just as administrators of fire insurance try to prevent fires, so administrators of employment security reserves would try to prevent unemployment. The possession of employment security reserves would change the whole outlook of corporate management. Every expansion program, every advertising or selling campaign, would be scrutinized with the utmost care to gauge its ultimate effect upon employment security. And success in providing employment security means that you are doing a profitable business; for you can't have one without the other.

There is a widespread feeling that the problem of unemployment can be met through the expansion of government unemployment compensation. But a point which seems to have been overlooked is that government unemployment compensation actually stimulates unemployment, in that it gives industry an incentive to lay off employees (since government will take care of them) instead of exerting every effort to keep them profitably and steadily employed.

If Congress passed a law granting tax exemption to employment security reserves, the news would electrify the country. Of all measures advanced to combat future unemployment, surely this is the most obvious.

Corporations build reserves to safeguard bricks, mortar and machinery. How much more should they build reserves to safeguard human welfare?

FURTHER COMMENTS ON HOLY BAPTISM II

3. The Blessing of the Font. In the 1549 Prayer Book this was a separate office to be used at least once a month. The 1552 Book incorporated it into every Baptism service. Our American revision of 1928 put it into the solemn preface-form familiar in the consecration prayer of the Eucharist. It might help to mark off this section of the service if the rubrics directed the minister to pour the water into the font at this point rather than at the beginning—but that is a minor matter. It is especially regrettable that the Blessing contains no allusion to the burial and resurrection of Christ; although this is the one place in the service where it would be most appropriate to recall our burial with Christ by baptism into His death that we might be raised with Him to walk in newness of life (see Rom. 6:4; Col. 2:12). Instead we are given a reference to the obscure and debatable symbolism of the "water and blood" which the Fourth Evangelist describes as shed from our Lord's pierced side. Neither the ancient Fathers nor the modern critics are agreed regarding what the "water and blood" signified in the mind of the Evangelist. Some refer it to the purifications of the Old Covenant, others to the Baptism and Passion of our Lord; still others to the two Gospel sacraments.

In regard to the font itself, I should like to take this opportunity to appeal to our Church to have some common agreement as to where it should be placed in the church. The traditional place, of course, is near the church door, since it symbolizes our entrance into Christ's Holy Church. Another good place is at the entrance to the choir. But a vigorous protest is in order against the practice of some architects of providing a mere cubby-hole or tiny recessed chapel for the erection of the font, where so few people may conveniently witness the baptism or take an active part in the service. And the font ought to be larger than a bird-bath.

4. The Baptism. The signing with the cross with its superb explanation belongs, of course, in this brief but most important part of the rite. It is strange to contemplate the acrimonious bickering which this beautiful piece of ceremonial has caused in times past. No further comment on this section is needed except to note that the rubrics require the minister who baptizes to dip or to pour, not simply to dampen or moisten the head of the baptized.

5. The Thanksgiving. The bidding to thanksgiving, like the one on page 276, sounds stilted and unnatural, and it is not a particularly good introduction to the Lord's Prayer. It is entirely fitting that the Lord's Prayer be the first prayer which a new member of Christ's family says with his brethren. But it should have a proper introduction comparable to the one in the Holy Communion. The thanksgiving prayer might then be given a less grandiloquent bidding, though it is not necessary to have any at all. A rubric also might be added allowing other prayers before the Blessing, or else some optional prayers might be given (as in the Burial Office), for the home, for the sponsors, for the Church's mission, etc. This would be particularly useful when the Baptism rite is used independently of Morning or Evening Prayer.

During the processions to and from the font psalms or hymns may be sung. The hymns provided or suggested by our new hymnal by no means exhaust the possibilities. Turning through its pages at random I note the following: for the procession to the font: Nos. 331 (stanzas 1-2), 380 and 398; for the procession from the font: Nos. 351, 362, and 385. If the sacrament is administered during Morning or Evening Prayer, the canticles after the lessons may suffice to cover these processions. The singing of the Benedictus after a baptism is quite marvellous—the entire Benedictus, to be sure — with its climactic lines:

To give light to them that sit in darkness, and in the shadow of death,
and to guide our feet into the way of peace.

Church in Japan Holds Synod To Start Rebuilding

Presided Over by Bishop Paul Shinji Sasaki Who Was Only Recently Released from Prison

Edited by Sara Dill

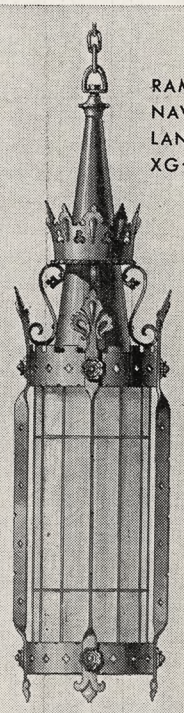
Tokyo:—Richard T. Baker, Religious News Service correspondent in Japan, in a story dated December 31, reveals that the first postwar general synod of the Episcopal Church in Japan has just been held, starting the wheels of reorganization turning after five years as an outlawed organization. When the religious bodies law was passed in 1940 Japanese Episcopalians refused to alter their constitution and canons in line with the official policy. As a consequence they were legally banned in Japan, persecuted, and their top leaders were finally thrown into jail. However, Episcopal leaders here do not admit that ecclesiastically the church was dissolved.

The synod, which met on the campus of St. Paul's University here, reincorporated the Nippon Seikokwai (Japan Episcopal Church) with its original constitution and canons in line with the new policy of religious freedom in Japan.

The Episcopal leaders set up a new national council and staffed it. They resolved to incorporate the Church under the forthcoming religious legal corporations act in order to protect its property. Also, they changed the Japanese words in usage for "bishop," "presbyter," and "deacon," decided to rebuild immediately the closed Central Theological Seminary, and launched a fund-raising campaign for the rehabilitation of Episcopal churches and institutions destroyed during the war.

Bishop Paul Shinji Sasaki, 58, presiding bishop of the Japan Episcopal Church, who emerged last June from four months' confinement as a "thought criminal," presided at the synod's sessions. The Rev. Keitaro Nishimura, rector of the Church of the True Light in Tokyo, was elected head of the national council.

The council was reorganized with five sections: general affairs, finance, education, literature and missions, with the following persons the respective heads of the sections: Rev. Hidetoshi Nosei, pastor of St. Andrew's Church, Shiba, Tokyo; Tatsumi Ishikawa, member of the Omori Church, Tokyo; Professor Furo Kurose, of the Central Theological Seminary; the Rev. Ryo Okumura, pastor of All Saints' Church, Tokyo; and the Rev. Yoneo Muruoka, pastor of the Kawasaki Church, outside Tokyo.



The Episcopal seminary, across the street from St. Paul's University, was closed during the war and its halls used for a school training Japanese gauleiters for the southern empire. Its main building and chapel were razed in the bombing of Tokyo, and will now be rebuilt. The school now meets with two students in a house on the campus.

The Japan Episcopal Church was the fourth largest Christian body in Japan, with about 240 churches, 31,000 members, and some of the best social and educational institutions in the country. At least eighty of these churches were burned during the war, and four schools. The synod approved plans to arrange for the rebuilding of destroyed property.

Under the official interpretation of the religious bodies law in 1940 the Episcopal Church was required to join the United Church of Christ in Japan. Because of its unique constitution and polity, Episcopalians refused to join the union. This act made them suspect throughout the war. Churches were visited weekly by police, and members were questioned and terrorized until all but a few stayed away from church.

In February, 1945, Bishop Sasaki, of the Tokyo diocese, Bishop Todomo Sugai, of the South Tokyo diocese, and the Rev. Mr. Nosei were taken into custody. Bishop Sugai and Pastor Nosei were beaten with bamboo rods. They were charged with responsibility for the church's refusal to join the union, with having loyalty to America and Britain and communications with both those enemy lands, with being spies, "peace thinkers" and defeatists. There was no proof of any of the military police charges, and the three men were freed in June.

One diocese of the Japan Episcopal Church, centered in Osaka, left the mother Church and joined the union. About sixty-eight of Japan's Episcopal congregations, most of them in the Osaka diocese, conformed to the government regulation and united with the rest of Japanese Protestants. Bishop Sasaki expects most of these churches to return to the Episcopal connection. He further predicts that the union as a whole will break up.

The bishop, two clergy and two laymen from nine of Japan's diocese made up the general synod. The Osaka diocese was not represented. Eight bishops were present. The diocese of Kyushu has no bishop for lack of funds, but a suffragan bishop will be named soon, Bishop Sasaki said.

Education Council

San Mateo, Calif. (RNS):—Twelve Protestant Churches have joined together to organize a council of Christian education to serve the three cities of San Mateo, Burlingame and Hillsborough. The council is composed of the minister and two lay persons from each church, and will convene each month to co-ordinate inter-denominational activities. Three committees were appointed to develop released-time education, church school teacher training and daily vacation Bible schools.

To Visit USSR

London (wireless to RNS):—A representative of the British Council of Churches will be among seventeen young people scheduled to visit Russia shortly at the invitation of the Soviet government. The church representative is Henry Jones, a Congregationalist, who is a staff member of the Student Christian Movement, working closely with the youth department of the British Council of Churches. Jones was chairman of the British delegation at the recent World Youth Conference in London and is now vice-chairman of the World Federation of Democratic Youth. Jones says he has been assured that he will meet Russian church leaders during the tour, which is sponsored by the Anglo-Soviet South Friendship Alliance.

Prays in Parliament

Belgrade (wireless to RNS):—Exarch Stefan, head of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church, read prayers at the opening of the Bulgarian Parliament and imparted his blessing to the assembly, according to a Sofia dispatch here.

Race Relations

New York (RNS):—The growing tension and friction in race relations which developed through the war can only be arrested by aggressive action by the Church, the Rev. Edwin M. Poteat, president of Colgate-Rochester Divinity School, told those attending the annual meeting of the race relations department of the Federal Council of Churches, meeting here last week.

"The instruments of politics," he stated, "will be important without public support of decent, democratic and Christian race attitudes, and public support will not be developed except by those who see it as a moral priority of the first order. No hypocrisy is more odious and obvious than that of which many churchmen, lay and clerical, are guilty in these affairs."

Visits Germany

London (wireless to RNS):—Re-education of Nazi-indoctrinated youth is the German Church's major problem according to Dean W. R. Matthews of St. Paul's Cathedral who has just returned from a visit to that country.

"The one really hopeful thing we saw in Germany," he told the newspaper men, "was the vigor of Church life and the way Church leaders, including Roman Catholics, are taking hold of the situation. In Church life we saw the only genuine sign of vitality in Germany today."

Professor John Baillie of the Church of Scotland, who was also on the visit, disclosed that the thousands of churches which escaped destruction are crowded regularly with worshippers.

Case Worker

Washington:—Miss Priscilla A. Lee has been appointed case worker of the social service department of the diocese of Washington. She was born in Kulang, China, where she lived until five years old when she came to Chatham, Virginia, where her father is the head of Chatham Hall. She is a Vassar graduate and did her social service work at the New York School of Social Work.

The director of the social service department is the Rev. J. Brook Mosley.

St. Paul's University

Toyko (wireless to RNS): — St. Paul's University, one of the three Christian universities in Japan to be recognized by the government, and operated by the Episcopal Church, is slowly recovering its normal life. For three years it was in the hands of extreme Japanese nationalists who erased every mark of Christianity. Today there are 800 students, with another 1,000 in the middle school.

Protests Return of Dead

New York:—The Rev. Elmore McKee, rector of St. George's, vigorously protested the plan to bring back the bodies of American dead from Europe in his Christmas sermon. Branding it "an example of organized paganism" he said that "it is also an affront to the graciousness of Christmas. Whence comes the driving force behind this plan? Is it from interests which will make money from the transaction? Overemphasis of the body is pure paganism. It stems not from Judaism or Christianity but only from a secularism that clutches the transitory. These men fought not for things material but for indestructible values of the spirit, untrammeled by the limitations of earth and of the mortal body. Would they not certainly wish their bodies to serve as permanent promise that Europe and America can be one?"

Legalize Amen

Brookings, S. D. (RNS):—How loudly one may recite "Amen" during a church service without creating a disturbance will be determined in circuit court here as result of an action filed by the Church of Christ. The church and its trustees are attempting to enjoin Mr. and Mrs. Allen R. McMillan, residents near here and members of the congregation for many years, from attending services since they were expelled from the membership by an action taken September 9, 1945. In its petition the church accuses Mr. and Mrs. McMillan of disturbing services by repeatedly shouting "Amen" during the services, and cites one particular instance when the couple disrupted the first sermon of Rev. Hubert Prather on August 12, 1945. It is claimed that the couple continued to disturb services after being warned.

McMillan contends in an affidavit that he never uttered "Amen" loudly during any service and wants to continue coming to church. He said he had been a member for 16 years, and if unable to attend the Brookings church he would have to drive to Arlington, S. D., to find a church of similar faith.

Criticize Cardinals

Paris (wireless to RNS):—Designation of Archbishop Pierre Petit de Julleville of Rouen and Archbishop Clement Emile Roques of Rennes as members of the College of Cardinals has created adverse comment in anti-clerical circles throughout France. These charge that the Vatican has "flouted resistance opinion" by naming two supporters of the former Vichy regime to the Curia.

Hailed with general approval, however, was the selection of Archbishop Jules Saliege of Toulouse, whose outstanding anti-Nazi record has given him considerable prestige and popularity in all circles. Sixty-five years old, Archbishop Saliege was arrested by the Germans because of his resistance activity, but because of his health he was allowed to remain in his diocese. A native of Nantal, the Cardinal-designate was ordained in 1895, made Bishop of Gap in 1925, and succeeded Monsignor Germail as Archbishop of Toulouse in 1928.

Barth to Berlin

Berlin (wireless to RNS):—The Russian-sponsored University of Berlin has invited Prof. Karl Barth, internationally-known Swiss theologian, to lecture at the university this month. Barth, who will be visiting Berlin for the first time since the start of the war, has been invited to lecture on "The Gospel and the modern world." He will be accompanied by Prof. Fritz Lieb of the University of Basel, an authority on Russia, who will speak on "The Russian man in history."

Also on Barth's itinerary will be an address before the pastors of the Confessional Church of the Province of Brandenburg who have requested him to talk on "The political task of the Church." This latter request is taken here as reflecting an increasing awareness, particularly among the younger German clergymen, of the necessity of individual political responsibility if Germany's rehabilitation is to succeed.

Several high Red Army officers have invited Barth and Lieb to dinner during their stay here.

Priests Condemned

Belgrade (wireless to RNS):—Two Roman Catholic priests were condemned to death and three others sentenced to hard labor at the conclusion of a mass trial in Ljubljana of thirty-four persons charged with pro-Nazi collaboration during the war. The condemned priests were Father Peter Krizjau, of Ljubljana, who was ordered hanged; and Father Franz Tserkovnik, of Shent Jernej, who was sentenced to be shot. Father Alfons Klemenchice received a sentence of 20 years' imprisonment, and Fathers Henrik Gorichan and Jozje Savor were given terms of 15 and 12 years, respectively.

Five Franciscan monks and two nuns are among a large group of suspected collaborationists who are at present on trial before a people's court in Sarajevo.

Urge Boycott

Portland, Ore. (RNS):—The Portland Council of Churches, through its department of race relations, has urged a boycott of restaurants and other establishments which discriminate against non-whites. The action came in the form of a resolution, adopted first by the First Congregational church. In its concurring action, the council said of the freeze-out methods of many local firms, "the situation is deplorable and definitely contrary to the principles to which a democratic people is dedicated."

Senator Norris Memorial

Norris, Tenn. (RNS):—Erection of a church as a memorial to the late Senator George W. Norris of Nebraska, father of the Tennessee Valley Authority, is being considered by the Norris Religious Fellowship. The Rev. Tom ("Shorty") Cowan, pastor, suggested at a dinner of the Fellowship that $100,000 be considered as a goal, funds to be raised by contributions from liberals throughout the nation.

Tracy B. Augur, TVA official, is chairman of a committee investigating the feasibility of such a project. An act of Congress would be required to erect the church on government property. Proposals are for a $30,000 Norris memorial chapel and $70,000 to be invested as an endowment fund to keep alive the "liberal spirit" associated with Senator Norris.

The only religious building in Norris now is Fellowship House, a chapel seating 50. It was originally a fire hall, but was moved and remodeled by volunteer labor. It is used for weddings and christenings, while regular church services are held in the Norris High School gymnasium.

Two Outstanding Books

WHERE ART THOU?

By C. AVERY MASON. In this stimulating book, the recently consecrated Bishop Coadjutor of Dallas sets forth his convictions about the significance of freedom in human life. Dr. Mason's book is commended to all those who recognize that the well-being of the world depends upon the establishment of a world order based upon freedom and righteousness. How freedom and righteousness may be achieved through communion with God is revealed in this book. $1.00

HIS BODY THE CHURCH

By W. NORMAN PITTENGER. The author presents in this book a statement of a soundly historic but scholarly view of the nature of the Church and of its ministry. In his own words Dr. Pittenger says, "Here is a book which tries to tell you what the Christian Church looks like 'from the inside' by one who believes it to be part of the gospel of God in Christ, outside which salvation in the uniquely Christian sense is impossible." $2.50

New School Head

Gladstone, N. J.:—The Rev. Robert L. Clayton, at present chaplain and history teacher at St. Bernard's School, has been elected rector of the institution, effective June 1. The school has been without a rector since the death of the Rev. Thomas A. Conover in 1943. Mr. Harold D. Nicholls has been head of the school since that time. Acting upon his recommendation the trustees have chosen a clergyman as rector, with Mr. Nicholls remaining as the senior master.

Auxiliary Meets

Newark:—The Auxiliary of the diocese of Newark held its first 1946 meeting on January 2 at the diocesan house. Mrs. John E. Hill of Philadelphia, a member of the national board of the Auxiliary, spoke on opportunities for Church women in the post-war world and Bishop Ludlow spoke on the Reconstruction and Advance program.

Chancellor Appointed

Orlando, Fla.: — The Hon. A. Eugene Carpenter of this city has been appointed chancellor of the diocese of South Florida, succeeding the late J. Picton Warlow. The position has been filled by a member of the same law firm since the diocese was organized in 1893.

BACKFIRE

Readers are encouraged to comment on editorials, articles and news. Since space is limited we ask that letters be brief. We reserve the right to abstract and to print only those we consider important.

MRS. W. E. COX
Churchwoman of Southern Pines, N. C.

I have recently seen the picture The Southerner and I heartily agree with the Memphis board of censors that it gives an "unfair picture of southern life." The only thing typical of the South was the cotton crop. Any other crop would or could have placed it elsewhere. I also think you would find no doubt fewer "hostile and anti-social neighbors" in the South than anywhere else in the country no matter what they had gone through with. This was my reaction to the play at its close and the lady setting next to me made the same comment on the way out. Why I am writing this at this time is because I read the piece about this movie in the WITNESS some time ago.

PHILIP H. STEINMETZ
Rector at Ashfield, Massachusetts

The letter in Backfire for Dec. 13th from E. T. Lawrence of Tillicum, Washington, with its frank paganism reminds me of a prayer attributed to John Lesley, a 17th century bishop in northern Ireland which I pass on to you for whatever it may be worth. To me the resemblance to Mr. Lawrence's closing sentence is startling. Lawrence says:

"We can expect no help from a God we do not serve, consequently, we have to fight our own battles and the victory will invariably go to those who can fight the hardest and last the longest."

Bishop Lesley says:

"Almighty God, unto whom our hearts are open, thou knowest the righteousness of the cause we have taken in hand, and that we are actuated by the clearest conviction that our motive is just. But, as our manifold sins and wickedness are not hid from thee, we presume not to claim thy protection trusting in our own perfect innocence. Yet, if we be sinners, they are not saints. Though, then, thou vouchsafest not to be with us, be not against us, but stand neuter this day, and let the arm of flesh decide it."

MR. WINSLOW AMES
Layman of Coshocton, Ohio

I rise to the bait offered by Mr. Lawrence in BACKFIRE of 13 December, not so much to defend Bishop Lawrence, who can hand it out and take it too, as to say Mr. Lawrence's argument is literally damned nonsense. Nonsense because it is irrational and from a pragmatic point of view without sense or practicality, and damned because it is bad regardless of practicality or impracticality. It is not unpreparedness that invites attack, but a false position; and this is true whether or not the attacker is in a pathological condition as the Nazi was. The false position I refer to is that of the big self-satisfied cock of the walk, complete with protective tariffs, insulting immigration restrictions, and other selfish paraphernalia.

It is a serious error both in definitions and in counting to refer to pacifist members of Congress. Jeanette Rankin if not a pacifist pur sang is very close to one; and by my count she was the only pacifist in Congress in a long long time. It is an error to say our pacifism when what is meant is isolationism. Pacifists are pacifists to a considerable extent precisely because they are not isolationists.

But what really makes me cry nonsense to Mr. Lawrence is his final paragraph, as nifty a counsel of despair as a professing Christian could put up. Admittedly some of what he says is true, namely that if we don't serve God we are condemned to fight battles in general (he seems to take much the Morrison-Niebuhr view which in this respect has considerable virtue). But his view of victory is plainly contrary to his own simple Christian instruction.

Further, the condition-contrary-to-fact which he sets up, namely that if but 50% of the people were motivated by the Christian spirit there would be no wars, is a perfectly sound true pacifist argument. He seems to have failed to observe that it is the pacifist idea to get not 50% but 100% if possible of the people to just that motivation. If that is so, why tell the pacifists to shut up? How get the people to that motivation? You might as well tell a man it was not expedient for him to have children, that he would only be allowed to have grandchildren.

I promise not to say damn or nonsense to Mr. Lawrence. It is my hope and prayer that he will study some elementary logic and philosophy and then take a look at some classic pacifist literature.

MR. RICHARD C. S. DRUMMOND
Layman of Auburn, New York

My congratulations for giving us Sherman Johnson's splendid article of 6th December Places Where God Speaks. This is perfectly splendid work. It represents a going back to fundamentals which we lack sorely in our preaching and instruction. The doctrine is old, but it is new, and we ought to get it from our pulpits—get it more, get it constantly.

Never have I seen such an admirable setting forth of these important fundamental elements of our faith, and of what is in and what is meant by the "Word of God."

I am clipping this item and laying it aside in my folder. But I feel that I should do more—at least write to say that Dr. Johnson is entitled to great praise for the scholarly fashion in which he handled this topic.

But please—oh, please—do not deprecate the use of the King James version. The other translations are useful, but their words lack majesty and dignity and power such as we get in the Elizabethan stateliness of the King James Version.

Kimber Den Writes His Thanks To American Friends

He Tells of the Thanksgiving Celebrations For Victory and Plans for Reconstruction

By Kimber H. K. Den

Lichwan, Kiangsi, China: — The other day I heard from our missionary treasurer, Mr. A. J. Allen in Kunming, of a receipt of $1,000 U. S. from the readers of THE WITNESS and CLID members, for our work here. It came in very timely to meet our desperate needs. Let me salute you all and thank you with all my heart and soul for all the efforts my friends in America make in their continuous supply of financial assistance to us. I don't see how we could ever be able to pull things together here without your special help.

We are all mighty glad beyond expression to see this last world war ended with final victory for the allied nations. We had a big celebration of this happy event on our Thanksgiving Day. All of our refugees in our three refugee colonies joined in the celebration and offered their thanks to God for the happy restoration of peace, freedom and joy to the world. I do hope that this peace we now have may be a lasting one, built on the foundation of Christian love, brotherhood and sacrifice. All the peace treaties and pacts which we have made will mean nothing if men's hearts are still being filled with greed, hatred and selfishness. Hence if a new world is to be born the Christian Church must play a part in bringing it to birth. It makes me tremble with fear when I think of the vast problems of post-war reconstruction in war-torn China alone.

Perhaps you know that our field centers, both in Hwangchen and Changshen have been made training centers for youth in this part of the country. This quiet corner of this hilly country has become a very important center for political and military activities overnight. I do hope we have the resources to develop our religious work in proportion to other activities of life. We have quite a large number of Christian students under training in the youth centers. Some of them are very devoted to their Christian faith. To meet their special needs we have started special services for them on Sundays. Also a special choir has been organized among them. These training camps offer us a unique opportunity for services of all kinds to the future leaders of China.

Both Mrs. Robin Chen (wife of the assistant Bishop of Anking) and her three daughters came to us some time ago. We are now living together here very happy and sound. In spite of the inconveniences and hardships involved in a country village life as we have here we feel very much blessed in many other things for which we can lift our hearts unto the Lord with praise and thanksgiving.

As soon as arrangements can be made I plan to take a short trip to Nanchang, free after six years of occupation by the Japanese. It is a city where I worked for twenty years before the war and I am quite anxious to see how is the condition of things down there regarding both our church properties and possibilities of rehabilitation for civilian refugees "returning home." It will take huge sums of money to restore our Church work along to say nothing of other reconstruction work there. I do hope that the Lord will bless us with increased strength, new courage and wisdom to meet the tasks ahead. For this your humble brother will, of course, need more than ever your continuous interest and encouragement, so well manifested in the last few years. I hope to write WITNESS readers again to tell you in a concrete way of our needs in Nanchang after I have completed my visit there.

With improved mail service I trust this letter will be able to get to you sometime before Christmas. If so, kindly convey my best Christmas greetings to all WITNESS readers who have been so generous in helping with our work here, and to all my friends in America. The days won't be very long before we all can meet again for a happy reunion either in China or in America.

The letter was dated Sept. 5 and arrived in New York on December 27. It was by air mail and carried $24 in Chinese stamps. If there are those who wish to help Kimber Den with his great work among refugees kindly make checks payable to "Treasurer, CLID," and mail to the Church League for Industrial Democracy, 155 Washington Street, New York 6, N. Y.

BISHOP MANNING TO BE HONORED

New York: — Bishop Manning is to be honored at the annual dinner of the Church Club on January 29th, the occasion marking his 80th birthday, the 55th anniversary of his ordination to the priesthood and the 25th anniversary of his consecration as a bishop. The speakers are to be Bishop Henry K. Sherrill of Massachusetts; Admiral W. T. Cluverius, the president of Worcester Polytechnic Institute and the Rt. Rev. H. St. George Tucker, the Presiding Bishop. The toastmaster at the dinner will be the president of the Church Club, Judge Robert McC. Marsh.

CHAPLAIN PENNINGTON RETURNS

Washington:—The Rev. Edgar L. Pennington, a navy chaplain since August, 1941, has recently been relieved from active duty. Formerly rector of Holy Cross, Miami, Fla., from which he was given a leave of absence but from which he later resigned, Chaplain Pennington served a large part of the time with a mobile hospital in the Pacific. In New Zealand he preached in over 30 Anglican churches and was the first American Episcopal clergyman invited to assist in an Anglican ordination in that country. He also preached before the general synod of the province and was given the honor of preaching in the cathedral at Auckland on Independence Day. He was released from the service with the rank of Lieutenant Commander. He is a contributing editor of THE WITNESS.

DISTINGUISHED PREACHERS FOR LENT

Providence: — Grace Church has announced Lenten preachers for Lent. They are Bishop Lawrence of Western Massachusetts, former rector of the parish; Bishop Bennett of Rhode Island; the Rev. Theodore P. Ferris of Trinity Church, Boston; the Rev. Gardiner M. Day of Christ Church, Cambridge; the Rev. Samuel M. Lindsay, Baptist minister of Brookline, Mass.; the Rev. Ralph W. Sockman, Methodist minister of New York; Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam, Methodist bishop of New York; the Rev. Boynton Merrill, Congregational minister of Columbus, Ohio, and the rector of the parish, the Rev. Clarence H. Horner.

BISHOP BINSTED VISITS HONOLULU

Honolulu, T. H.:—On his way to the United States, Bishop Norman S. Binsted of the Philippines stopped here where he told of his experiences as a prisoner of the Japanese at an informal reception given by Bishop and Mrs. Kennedy. He stated that the people of the Philippines, even though they had lost their places of worship, were attending services in great numbers. He spoke of some places where they would have an average of from five to seven hundred at a single service, with the weekday communion services also exceptionally well attended. He declared that what he needs more than anything else is more men to help rebuild the work.

Bishop Kennedy, following the meeting, wrote that "Bishop Binsted said that since the war many have drifted away from Christianity due in a great measure to the influence of Russia. Our part now is to bring them back into the Church for they have gone into ways that have not used the influence of the Church as a basis for their beliefs. It is something we must face for it has had a far greater influence on the people than we realize.

"As for the stories of atrocities, the Bishop declared that most of the horrible things we have heard are true. But the character of the man is evidenced by his firm belief in the Japanese Christians who made a desperate effort to show they were not of the same calibre as those Japanese who were dominated by their military rulers. He knew the anguish of real starvation, for he lost many, many pounds during his internment as a prisoner of war. One cannot suffer and see suffering and not be touched by the tragedy of it all, but we who have heard Bishop Binsted know that his experiences have made him know where to place emphasis on the values of life.

"He could not give too much praise to his Chinese churchmen, who really kept the work of the Church going by loaning him $110,000 to see that his needs were met. This loan was made to him by word of mouth, no signing of notes, no pledge of a definite date for payment. Had this been done it could have been the means for his death as well as for those who gave him assistance. He secretly buried the money and gave it out when and where it was needed, even under the eyes of the military police. The debt to the Chinese has been paid in full by the National Council . . . a debt we are sure they very eagerly and proudly paid.

"It was a wonderful privilege to sit and listen to Bishop Binsted. There was no bitterness in his voice as he revealed the sufferings of himself and his people; there was only an eagerness to start again and be about his Master's business, and a prayer that he might do it even more effectively because of these experiences which had come to him because men of good will had not worked hard enough and diligently enough to bring about a lasting peace."

CHURCHMEN IN THE NEWS: the Rev. Theodore P. Ferris is to be a Lenten preacher in Providence; Bishop William T. Manning of New York to be honored by New York Churchmen; Chaplain Edgar L. Pennington ends his long service with the navy

DR. FRANCIS WEI AT E.T.S.

Cambridge, Mass.: — The Rev. Francis Wei of China is to lecture on Christianity and the cultural heritage of the Chinese at Episcopal Theological School on Monday evening from February 4 through March 11. They are to be held at 8 p.m. and are open to the public. These lectures are given concurrently at Union Seminary in New York and at Andover-Newton Seminary at Newton, Mass.

Bard College Offers Program For the Servicemen

Provides for Special Training in Various Fields to Round Out His General Education

By C. H. Gray
The President of Bard College

Annandale-on-Hudson, N. Y.:— Bard College is already educating returned servicemen. Among them are men preparing to enter such varied careers as scientific research, the ministry, business, hotel administration, journalism, law, medicine, and writing. As a college of liberal arts, Bard does not believe that liberal education is unrelated or antagonistic to education for useful work in the world. It understands the need of the veteran to prepare himself or herself for some life work as well as to pursue with the maturity gained in war experience the questions of life that face all citizens of modern society. The College has made some significant changes in the procedures of American college education to meet these two needs of the veterans as well as other students.

At Bard the student's program is not made up of required subjects. Each student, with the aid of teacher-advisers, makes his own curriculum to suit as nearly as possible his own interests, tastes, ambitions, and vocational or professional objectives. The central course in his program is a tutorial course in the subject which is of major interest to him. In this course, in which he meets alone with his teacher, he helps to lay out the ground to be covered and he can go as fast and as far as his capacities permit. He gets down at once to essential problems in the field of study and begins to learn how to solve them. If he wants to be a scientist, he begins on scientific problems and finds out what it means and what it takes to be a scientist. If he wants to be an economist, a labor relations counselor, a clergyman, a diplomat, a novelist, or a sculptor, he learns through direct attack on essential tasks what it means and what it takes to be any of these things.

When the student finds that he needs special skills before he can solve the problems before him, he makes room in his program for such training. In the tutorial course, immediate trial and exploration of his interests and skills are made, and his training takes the road dictated by what each individual wants and needs. What he needs, furthermore, is not dictated either by individual whims or by some abstract conception of "what every educated man should know," but rather by the standards of good work that have been established in his profession or field of interest.

The other courses in his four-course program are chosen each semester to supplement his study in the major field and to round out his general education. In the choice of these courses, the student's previous knowledge and training, and the kinds of experience that he needs for the development of his personality are taken into consideration by his advisers. An organic curriculum is thus the outgrowth of the student's curiosity and of the requirements of the career he foresees for himself.

The Bard faculty, therefore, take their students — not veterans alone, but all students — into partnership in their own educational planning. The Bard system offers the kind of adult relationship between the student and teacher which the veterans will appreciate and make the most of.

Bard is a coeducational college of liberal arts and sciences, with a present capacity for about 225 students. The ratio of teachers to students is about one to seven, a high ratio permitting a large amount of individual attention. Courses are given in a wide variety of subjects in the four major divisions of natural sciences and mathematics; social sciences; languages and literature; and fine arts, music, and drama. These courses are related directly to an infinite number of careers in the world. They introduce serious students also to the political, philosophical, religious, and social problems of our time, and thus provide the basis for a continuing liberal education through life.

Bard was founded in 1860 as St. Stephen's College. It has been associated from the beginning with the Episcopal Church. The chapel, a beautiful example of Gothic architecture, is the center of the religious life. Its services are conducted by the chaplain of the College, who is also an instructor in religion and philosophy and is rector of the neighboring parish of St. John the Evangelist, Barrytown. A college chapel association and the chapel choir are student organizations appealing to those who desire more active participation in the religious life of the campus.

In the social organization of the College, the veteran will also find that he is dealt with as a mature individual. Students, faculty, and other residents on the campus are organized as a democratic community. All matters relating to the common welfare are under the jurisdiction of the community government in which all the residents participate on an equal footing. Social and other extra-curricular activities are promoted by the community government. The general standards of conduct are those of good society elsewhere. Freedom is given to young people to live as responsible adults. Rules and regulations are made by the community whenever they are necessary to protect the welfare of the group. The aim is to develop individual responsibility rather than to prolong infancy by boarding-school restrictions. Students who come to Bard are offered the freedom of adult society and are expected to assume the responsibilities of such a society.

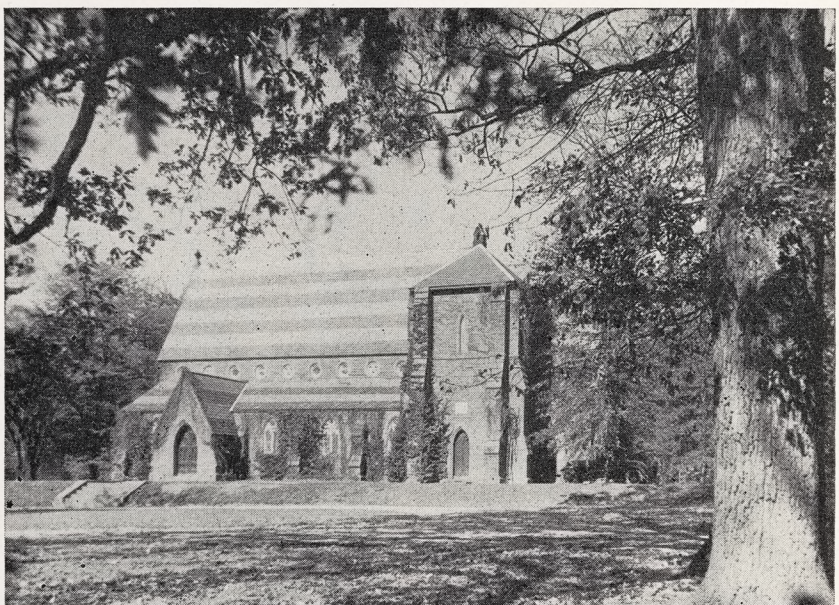
In helping young men or women to resume their education, the College has assumed that veterans will demand that their courses be planned to fit their own individual requirements. If their vocational or professional ambitions are fairly definite, the students will wish to begin training for their careers as early as possible, without the requirement of courses not too clearly relevant to their purposes. They will wish to be given a real trial of and a real exploration into their capacities for the special kind of work which their professions will demand. They may be in a hurry to get "degrees," but they will be more interested in the knowledge and skills that will result from their college studies. If veterans come to Bard with less definite vocational aims, they will still be eager to learn the answers to real questions, and not wish merely to "take courses."

These veterans have been accustomed in the armed services to be dealt with in large groups and to subordinate their particular temperaments and desires to the common good. Now that they are out of uniform, not only will they wish for an opportunity to follow the lines of their own inquiry, but they should be encouraged to do so. For the good of society, as well as of themselves, every effort should be made to overcome the effects of regimentation and to draw out whatever they may have of individual initiative, curiosity, and imagination.

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION CONFERENCE

Chicago: — Forty denominations will be represented when about 1,500 religious educators meet at Columbus, Ohio, February 10-16, for the annual meeting of the International Council of Religious Education. One of the highlights of the occasion will be an address by Harold E. Stassen, former governor of Minnesota, and the presentation to him of the first copy of the new, revised standard version of the New Testament.



The Episcopal Church will be represented by the Rev. Maurice Clarke of South Carolina; Miss Maude Cutler of Norfolk, Va.; Miss Irene Scudds of Cincinnati; the Rev. R. U. Smith of Detroit; Miss Evelyn Spickard of New York, and the following representatives of the National Council: the Rev. Daniel A. McGregor, Miss Avis Harvey, the Rev. Vernon McMaster, the Rev. A. Ronald Merrix; Miss Charlotte Tompkins, Miss Frances Young.

SUMMER CONFERENCE ANNOUNCED

Burlington, Vt.:—The diocese of Vermont is the first to announce plans for a 1946 summer conference. It will be held from June 17 through 21, with the Rev. Charles S. Martin, rector of St. Paul's, here, as director and the Rev. Robert Rodenmayer of St. John's, Northampton, Mass., as chaplain. Columnist Massey Shepherd Jr. of THE WITNESS, professor at Cambridge Seminary, is to be a member of the faculty. A new feature: arrangements have been made for boarding children, 3-9, so that younger married people may attend.

BISHOP REMINGTON ANNIVERSARY

Philadelphia:—A service to commemorate the anniversary of the consecration of Bishop William Remington was held in the chapel of the Church House here on January 10, with Bishop Hart the celebrant. Bishop Remington was consecrated suffragan bishop of South Dakota on January 10, 1918. In 1922 he was elected missionary bishop of Eastern Oregon and in 1945 he became suffragan of Pennsylvania.

The beautiful chapel is the center of religious life at Bard College

FEDERAL COUNCIL BACKS TRUMAN

New York (RNS): — President Truman's directive of December 22 to allow the entry of displaced persons into the United States has been commended by the executive leaders of the Federal Council of Churches. In a letter to the White House the churchmen promised their support of action by the government looking toward the entrance "of such displaced persons and refugees as may qualify for admittance under existing quota laws."

EDITORIALS

The Seminaries in 1946

JUST as an army stands under the instant orders of its commander, so a living Church stands under the instant orders of its Lord. Like an army it is given special tasks at special times by its living leader. During the war our task was to keep the Church and its ministrations with the men in the armed forces and to adapt our endeavors to the peculiar circumstances of a dislocated society. In 1946 our assignment is a different one. We are to "rise up and build"; to raise up things that have been cast down; to advance in the name of the Lord. The special task now is to oversubscribe the Reconstruction and Advance Fund.

But it is likewise true that an army, even as it fights its most crucial campaigns, must be prepared for the long future that lies ahead. At the same time that the tragedy of Dunkirk was taking place young men were being trained for future battles on the quiet fields of England; and even as the Germans were sweeping across the plains of Russia, far in the hinderland new armies were being formed and trained. We have special tasks assigned to us at special times—that is true—but we must likewise continue to support the basic work upon which the future of the Church also depends.

The Bishop of Kunming has said, "The Chinese Church wants the west to send it well-trained priests more than anything else." Bishop Angus Dun of Washington writes, "There can hardly be any fundamental reconstruction and advance unless the professional schools which train our leaders are adequately maintained." Whether the Church will continue to advance, in brief, depends upon the quality, training, devotion and imagination of the men who come from the theological schools. Even while special tasks are being undertaken this theological education must receive the prayers and financial assistance of the whole Church.

Four immediate and pressing facts, and one abiding consideration, will show us the importance of theological education in 1946. First, in order merely to maintain its ranks the Church needs 150 new clergy every year. The total capacity of our seminaries is barely adequate for this and any expansion or improvement of their facilities will inevitably require the financial assistance of the Church. Second, during the war years our seminaries were compelled to run at about half their capacity and this has resulted in a clergy shortage which will not be ended even by the return of the chaplains. This question of recruiting men for the ministry of the Church should be the concern of every parish. There can be no advance of the Church unless the ranks of the ministry are kept filled. Third, one of the happy things of the present year is that our seminaries, with the end of the war, are beginning to fill again. Serious and able men are turning to the schools from the armed forces. This is a grave responsibility that concerns the whole future of the Episcopal Church for the seminaries must be ready to train them with adequate staffs and equipment. Improved dormitory facilities, apartments for married students, and a chaplain temporarily added to the staff are among the most pressing immediate needs. No man who can become a good priest should be turned away and if there is to be any marked advance in the life of the Church our seminaries should run at more than their present capacity in the years ahead. Fourth, we owe much to our chaplains. In many instances they have lived under great strain and in almost all cases they have had little opportunity for study or life-giving fellowship with their brother clergy. In fairness to them and their work in the future they must be provided with special opportunities for brief periods of study and refreshment. Needless to say this involves expense for the seminaries.

To these immediate and pressing needs which involve the life of the whole Church we must add the abiding need of interpreting Christianity anew to every age. Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, today and forever, but the people of the Church are in each generation in a new situation, facing different problems. The living word of God must be presented in the language of the present so that

I BELIEVE that the reason of life is for each of us simply to grow in love. I believe that this growth in love will contribute more than any other force to establish the Kingdom of God on earth. To replace a social life in which division, falsehood and violence are all-powerful, with a new order in which humanity, truth and brotherhood will reign. I believe that the will of God has never been more clearly, more freely expressed than in the teachings of Jesus. I believe that this teaching will give welfare to all humanity, save men from destruction, and give this world the greatest happiness.

men in the atomic age know both the judgment and mercy of him who ever lives. In this sense there is an eternal modernism . . . the need of the Church to be relevant to the age in which it lives. Only with a trained ministry can it be. The task of our seminaries, says one of our deans, is "to produce consecrated, authentic men of God; indomitable champions of the right; unmistakable interpreters of the good news of Christ; indefatigable helpers to men in their time of need; alert messengers to win the world."

In this work the seminaries ask the prayers and financial support of the whole Church.

General Convention Issues

WE ALWAYS have fun at editors meetings discussing topics for our Lenten series. Once in three years of course it is easy . . . The Issues Before General Convention. The problem then is to determine what the issues are and finding the best people to write on them. We have not yet completed the line up for 1946 but we are far enough along to make this preliminary announcement, with the hope that you will think well enough of it to plan now to use the articles in your parishes this Lent. When the program is completed we will send announcements to the clergy, with the usual return card for orders. Meanwhile here is the list as it now stands.

There will be two articles on An Over-All Strategy for the Church, Domestic and Foreign. The Rev. Herbert W. Prince, rector at Lake Forest, will write one of these and Bishop Keeler of Minnesota has been asked to do the other. There will also be two articles on The Marriage Canon, one by Bishop Parsons and the other by Mrs. Henry Hill Pierce. Likewise there will be two articles on Unity With Presbyterians. The first will be by the Rev. Henry Pitney Van Dusen, president of Union Seminary; the other article on this subject will be written by the Rev. Theodore Wedel, warden of the College of Preachers and a member of our commission on unity. Social Reconstruction will be written by the chairman of the commission, Bishop William Scarlett. Stringfellow Barr, the distinguished president of St. John's College will write on Internationalism and the Church. Then we have asked Bishop Powell of Maryland, chairman of the commission, to deal with Clergy Placement and we are hoping that another bishop will handle the matter of the proposed increase in assessment of The Church Pension Fund. Spencer Miller Jr., road commissioner of New Jersey, will write on Social Security for Lay Employees. Dean John W. Suter of Washington Cathedral and custodian of the Prayer Book will write on Proposals for Prayer Book Revision. Then too we have asked members of the commissions to write on The Presiding Bishops See and on Church Rural Work.

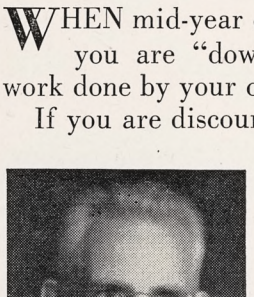
Surely one of the most important and interesting events to take place at Convention will be the election of the new Presiding Bishop. It is a difficult subject to deal with. Nevertheless we propose to deal with it editorially by presenting what we consider to be the necessary qualifications for the office. Then we will urge discussion by readers, as indeed we hope all these matters will be discussed. The way to have a Church that is vital and alive is to have members informed. The way to have a Church that is democratic is to have free and open discussion of the problems facing the Church. It is our hope and belief that this Lenten series will contribute to these ends.

The series will start in our issue for February 28 and articles will appear in eight numbers . . . as a matter of fact articles on two General Convention issues will be in most of the numbers.



We urge your cooperation through the use of these articles in your parishes in the Lenten Season.

For Church School Teachers

By
WILLIAM GRIME

WHEN mid-year comes around some of you say you are "downcast when you compare the work done by your class with other classes."

If you are discouraged through contrasting your success with others, try this: First, read Luke 12:48,-19: 12-26. You see, our Lord would here meet your need by helping you to balance your thoughts again. You are not to compare your achievements with teachers who have had greater advantages than you have had. Remember, "Unto whomsoever much is given, of him shall be much required." No, you are to contrast your success only with those who have had something like the same amount of experience, the same chances of experimenting with the better skills and the same opportunities that you have had to study content. Your success on this basis may be an even greater triumph than that of more experienced teachers.

Going further, try this: Go through one of the Gospels noting how often Jesus counseled His teachers not to over-worry. Then in your meditation face these simple facts. There are some factors in every teaching situation for which you are entirely responsible, such as, thorough preparation, willingness to guide, not push, readiness for emergencies and joyful consecration. But there are some factors in every teaching situation where your control is limited. For instance, you cannot determine what judgments your students will make on your teaching and you cannot coerce your students to put your attitudes or class experience into steady practice. Therefore, concern yourself only about the situations you can control and do not worry unduly about factors beyond your control. In short, do not over-worry about results. "We shall reap if we faint not." If you cease to worry about factors in teaching situations where your control is restricted, this will surely release more of your mind and soul into your work as a Christian teacher.

Fascist Threats at Home

by Jack R. McMichael

Executive Secretary of the Methodist Federation for Social Service

METHODIST Bishop Oxnam in a recent magazine article states that "the Nazis aren't all licked yet. They masquerade in Sunday-go-to-meeting coats as well as brown shirts." The Bishop was not just referring to Germans whom he met on his recent European tour. "The man who excludes a Negro from any of the privileges of this democracy, who connives with a real-estate agent to exclude a Jew from a neighborhood, who sets up barriers against any human being because of his race or his creed, is a Nazi. . . . It was a limited thing, to begin with, in Germany —the persecution of a minority within the borders of one country. It ended with the attempted enslavement of virtually all the peoples of the earth."

If the threat of fascism is still here, if the struggle against native fascism has entered a period of new intensity, we must learn how to spot the evil and how to eliminate it. The American army has rendered us a glorious service in this regard through its Orientation Fact Sheet 64, Fascism. The unspecified quotes in this article are from that fact sheet. "The people run democratic governments but fascist governments run the people. Fascism is government by the few and for the few." Understanding this we see why fighting fascism means fighting the poll tax and white primary: "by the few and for the few." Fascist regimes "permit no civil liberties, no equality before the law." Knowing this we know that the Supreme Court ruling against the deportation of Harry Bridges was a victory against fascism—and that those Texans were fighting fascism who acted to help save the life of L. C. Akins, a Texas Negro condemned to die for an offense for which no white man has ever or would ever be so condemned: "civil liberties . . . equality before the law."

Historically all "fascism came to power . . . at a time of social and economic unrest. A small group of men, supported in secret by powerful financial and military interests, convinced enough insecure people that fascism would give them the things they wanted. . . . Wherever free governments anywhere fail to solve their basic economic and social problems, there is always the danger that a native brand of fascism will arise to exploit the situation and the people." Knowing this we can understand the fascist threat which lurks in the present and growing threat of mass unemployment and suffering. Victory in the present fight for full, useful employment (as opposed to militarization—the only fascist answer) is the surest guarantee that incipient fascism will be destroyed, our democracy preserved and extended.

Fascism comes to power through "pitting religious, racial, and economic groups against one another." Are there such attempts in America today? Yes, says our war department document: "In the United States, native fascists have been anti-Catholic, anti-Jew, anti-Negro, anti-labor, anti-foreign-born. . . . Interwoven with the 'master race' theory of fascism is a well-planned 'hate campaign' against minority . . . groups." Such a campaign is being waged on the very floor of Congress today in the anti-Negro, and anti-Semitic tirades of men like Eastland, Bilbo, Rankin. We detect it also in the columns of the Hearst and McCormick and other press.

"Orientation Fact Sheet 64" can be had from the CLID, 155 Washington Street, New York 6, N. Y. at 10c a copy. Highly recommended also is Fact Sheet 70, "Prejudice" to be had at the same price from the Methodist Federation for Social Service, 150 Fifth Ave., New York 11, N. Y.

We find this campaign of racial hatred and anti-Semistism under the cloak of Catholic Christianity in men like Coughlin and Protestant Christianity in men like Gerald L. K. Smith. Such "Christian" native fascists find roots for their anti-Semitism in a false and irreparably harmful interpretation (which organized Christianity has yet to fully repudiate) of the relationship between Jesus and his people. Note this statement from a widely used Catholic New Testament: "The Jews are the synagogue of Satan. The true synagogue is the Christian Church." Or from Snowden's Sunday School Lessons (written by a Presbyterian minister) these words which could well have come from Hitler: "The Jew in the modern world has arrogated to himself . . . outstanding leadership in all nations and in every branch of human activity." Or from this parochial textbook: "The Jews hated our Lord. . . . And ever since the Jews have wandered about, a people without a flag, a country, a priest, an altar, or a sacrifice, a living testimony that indeed the vengeance of God fell upon them and their children." Such statements are as false as they are anti-Semitic. Jesus burned with indignation against the few who oppressed his people, but had warm love for, and deep faith in, the oppressed Jewish people themselves. He spoke of them as "salt of the earth . . . light of the world." And those Jewish "common people heard him gladly," for he was their friend, their champion. It was not "the Jews" who murdered Jesus. He was executed by Roman soldiers under orders of the Roman, Pontius Pilate. His execution was also fostered by an alliance of native Quislings (called Herodians) and ecclesiastical bigots who worked hand in hand with the foreign oppressors of the Jewish masses.

Today in America native fascism is on the warpath. Jewish boys are attacked and beaten on the streets. Synagogue windows have been broken. Anti-Semitism and racial bigotry in general are rampant. Openly fascist hate-groups are coming out of hiding. As our army document reminds us, fascists everywhere have used the "divide and conquer Hitler method." We see it today in the fear and hate-inciting rumor-mongering being directed against the Negroes and other minorities; in the attacks against Japanese-Americans and their rights on the West Coast; in the efforts to divide veterans from non-veterans (especially workers); "Christian" veterans from Jewish veterans; in the fostering of disunity between men and women workers. This is the pattern followed in every fascist country. These are ominous evidences of it in post-war America today.

In preparation for this article I spent a good deal of time reading the stomach-turning publications of American fascism—from the blatant pages of Gerald L. K. Smith's The Cross and the Flag to the more subtle columns of the Hearst and McCormick-Patterson press. Without single exception these publications in every issue play the trumpet of psychological preparation for war against the Soviet Union. Fascists have their differences. But they are united as to the importance of sowing suspicion and hostility against the Soviet Union.

Repudiation of America First nationalism, insistence on solid international economic and political cooperation in general and friendship with the Soviet Union in particular—must be part of the battle against our native fascists. It particularly needs assertion today that temporary American monopoly of the atomic bomb is no substitute for, but an additional imperative towards, that cooperation and friendship. The contrary path points to more war, more fascism.

IT IS historically true, as our army document proves, that fascists have been "in the pay of certain big industrialists and financiers who wanted to run the people with an iron hand." The army document affirms what Prof. Robert A. Brady so amply documents and proves in The Spirit and Structure of German Fascism—viz, that fascism does not destroy monopoly capitalism, but only speeds up the tendency within it towards ever greater concentration of power and wealth in the hands of the few. This also underscores the consistent fascist program of undermining and destroying genuine trade unions. The current legislative and propaganda campaign against trade unions, collective bargaining, the union shop, is completely in harmony with all fascist plans for America. We see this in its more subtle and respectable form in the voluminous Ball-Burton-Hatch Bill which professes the aim of industrial peace but is actually calculated to undermine labor's Magna Charta, the Wagner Act, and which was drawn up without the consultation of a single trade union or trade union leader . . . hardly a realistic way to promote industrial cooperation and peace. Less subtle is the anti-labor legislative campaign waged in state after state by Christian American, a native fascist organization led by Vance Muse and Lewis V. Ulrey. They call the C.I.O. "Marxian," and Ulrey insists that the Federal Council of Churches is part of a conspiracy to destroy the "American social and economic system!" The anti-labor activities of both men are of long standing. Ulrey opposed the Child Labor Amendment because of "socialistic-communistic origin." Muse in 1918, helped raise $250,000 from railroads to oppose the Adamson 8-hour day bill. He also raised money to oppose women's suffrage and the participation of ministers in political matters. In typical fascist pattern Muse wrote to the Louisiana legislature (which roundly rebuked him and his organization) that "From now on white women and white men will be forced into organizations with Black African Apes whom they will have to call 'brother' or lose their jobs." Ulrey wrote for Gerald B. Winrod's Defender that "it is not strange that the Germans decided against the Jews in favor of Hitler." Muse worked hand in glove with reactionary Pappy O'Daniel and helped promote the anti-New Deal convention in Macon sponsored by Talmadge, in which fascist Winrod participated and at which Muse circulated many photographs of Mrs. Roosevelt with Negroes. Christian American has been vigorously and effectively opposed by the Methodist women in Georgia and Texas and by other churchmen who rebel against such use of the term "Christian."

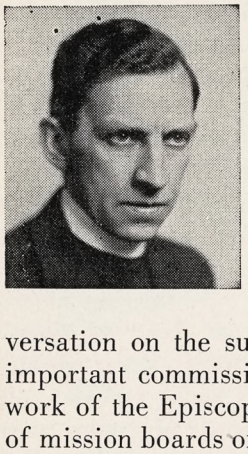
Fascists everywhere go in for hysterical red-baiting as our army document points out. Fascists in America prefer the "indiscriminate pinning of the label 'Red' on people and proposals" for social change to coming to grips with our social and economic evils: poverty amidst potential plenty, mass unemployment in peace, nation-wide racial discrimination, segregation and bigotry, which are the soil in which revolutionary movements grow. In the reactionary aftermath of the last war we had our witch-hunting Palmer raids. Today we have our Rankin or Wood "Un-American" Committee which carries on in the anti-progressive, anti-democratic fashion of its Dies Committee predecessor and is warmly welcomed and supported by native fascists. Unfortunately the dangerous weapon of red-baiting is employed also in the best of families and churches. The "Commu-Nazi" slogan was coined in America by our most notorious hate-spreading fascists. It is propagated today by very respectable Christians who follow the easy expedient of lumping fascism and communism together under the ambiguous term "totalitarian" without perceiving and proclaiming the profound gap between the two from the standpoint of the prophetic Christian ethic. Our army document helps us to make this distinction so vital for the fight against fascism—native or foreign. "Among the early opponents of fascism, the Communists were in the forefront . . . fascism means war . . . has never been secretive about its glorification of war." On the contrary, says Sumner Welles, "When the Soviet Union entered the League of Nations, even the most obstinate were soon forced to admit that it was the only major power which seemed to take the League seriously." It is Donald Nelson who states: "I know from what I saw and heard in Russia that the leaders and the people of that great country are anxious to work with us. They know that only world cooperation and enduring peace can produce the rapid internal development of Russia which is their main concern." Here is a basic contrast between fascism and communism: one glorifying war and one needing and seeking peace.

Our Army document stresses that "Learning to identify native fascists . . . is not easy . . . But it is vitally important to learn to spot them, even though they adopt names and slogans with popular appeal, drape themselves with the American flag, and attempt to carry out their program in the name of the democracy they are trying to destroy." As both Bishop Oxnam and the army fact sheet point out, "Fascism thrives on indifference and ignorance." The answer is in an informed, concerned and active citizenry—loyal participation in a continuing program of social education and action. "It involves being alert and on guard against the infringement not only of our own freedom but the freedom of every American. If we permit discrimination, prejudice, or hate to rob anyone of his democratic rights, our own freedom and all democracy is threatened." Nor should we forget in this ever smaller world that "if we want to make certain that fascism does not come to America, we must make certain that it does not thrive anywhere in the world."

SANCTUARY

Conducted by W. M. Weber

The Declaration of an Ecumenical Christian



AT BAPTISM I was admitted to no local or sectional order. The intention was to make me a member of the Church of Christ. As a member of the Church Universal, a representative of Christianity in all lands and ages, I am bound in loyalty to that Great Church, far more than to the particular denomination or local church to which I belong. I am an organ of Christian unity; a steward of the whole Church's spiritual heritage, of the whole Church's vision of truth and duty, of the whole Church's ranges of devotion, of the whole Church's resources in organization for fellowship and the cure of souls, of the whole Church's enduement as a channel for the grace of God. I should like, if it be not presumptuous, to appropriate St. Augustine's words: "I take a whole Christ for my Saviour; I take the whole Bible for my staff; I take the whole Church for my fellowship."—Adapted from the words of the late Principal Richard Davidson of Toronto, by the World Council of Churches.

Talking It Over

By
W. B. SPOFFORD

BURIED in the book shelves of many of the clergy and not a few laymen is a book called Rethinking Missions. It might be a good time to dig it up. Mr. John D. Rockefeller Jr. put up large money to send a team of experts to the Orient to study missions. It was a painstaking job, checked and double-checked, with much speculation while the study was on as to what the report would eventually contain. "Just wait and see," an officer of our National Council said to me during a long conversation on the subject. "You will find that this important commission will report that the mission work of the Episcopal Church is the best." Officers of mission boards of other Churches doubtless were saying the same thing.

What the commission did report, summed up in a sentence or two, was that the Christian Church would do a far better job through a united endeavor, at least in the fields of social service and education, than they could possibly do by going their several ways on a competitive basis. One good hospital in Shanghai would be far better than six small ones, all poorly equipped and understaffed, so how about getting together and doing the job right? They asked for efficiency and planning and a first-rate job in the name of the Christian Church.

But the debate was not kept long on that level. What about doctrine? What about theology? How can we cooperate with people who insist on baptism by emersion? How can we cooperate with people who do not accept the three orders of the ministry? How can we cooperate with people who use grape juice instead of the fermented grape? The answer was obvious and a good many people gave it: what has emersion, orders of the ministry, apostolic succession, wine or grape juice, got to do with removing the appendix of a sick Chinese child? Why can't we cooperate in running good hospitals, good schools and colleges, without compromising any of our cherished theological convictions? Nevertheless the debate went on for months on this theological level—whether or not kept there deliberately by those who wanted to discredit the report I presume nobody will ever know. In any case the time came when Rethinking Missions went into the book shelves to gather dust and there it has remained.

WAR, it is being drummed into us, has blasted off the face of the earth a good many of these hospitals, schools and universities. So we are urged "to arise and build." And it is important to know that not only are Episcopalians being so urged but practically every major Protestant Church in the United States is now in the midst of a campaign similar to our Reconstruction and Advance Fund. Are these campaigns, our own as well as the rest, based on the "return to normalcy" attitude which has raised such havoc everywhere? Certainly there are many who think so. Just yesterday I received a letter from the rector of an important parish. He writes: "What the plan invisions for the post-war Church is, in the last analysis, little more than a bigger and better pre-war Church. It overlooks entirely the famous statement in the Malvern Manifesto that the war is just a symptom of the sickness which has beset the modern world; a sickness which is to be found in an exceedingly virulent form within the Church. There are no doubt many ways in which this lack of vision might have been overcome. One is to have combined the plan with a scheme of cooperation with other Churches. Anyone who has lived and worked in an over-churched community cannot help but despair when all Churches are raising huge funds to carry on missionary work in the same territory. There are, at this point, enough potential converts for everyone and to spare, but the thought that the unhappy divisions present here are being foisted evermore securely on the Chinese, for instance, is almost more than can be borne. Granted that all differences will never vanish over-night, the Reconstruction and Advance Fund will live up to its name if some recognition of and some first steps towards this goal are included."

It isn't too late. My understanding is that how and where the money is to be spent is yet to be determined. What is needed is not less foreign missions but better foreign missions. What is needed in this One World is not Methodist missions, Prebyterian missions, Baptist missions, Episcopal missions—all petty jobs in comparion with what could be done if we united our missionary endeavor as Christian missions. And surely the present gives us a supreme opportunity when, literally, the building in many areas has to be done from the ground up.

Somewhere in our Churches there must be leaders with such a vision, possessing the statesmanship to make it a reality. Anyhow somebody ought to try.

Urge a Suffragan Bishop For Work of Chaplains

Social Service Workers of Third Province Discuss Common Problems at a Conference

Edited by Sara Dill

Washington:—Heads of diocesan departments of social relations of the third province want a suffragan bishop designated to supervise the work of chaplains in the army, navy and the veterans' administration. At a meeting in Washington last week they adopted a resolution asking the National Council to bring the matter before the General Convention next September.

The group discussed social relations programs for dioceses and parishes, Church-labor relationships, and the program of the Church with reference to veterans of the war. The Rev. W. Carroll Brook of Staunton, Va., presided.

The Rev. Almon R. Pepper of the National Council's division pointed out three divisions of the work of social relations: Social education and action, including race relations, world order, returning veterans, world relief and the Church and labor: social work, including keeping institutions related to the Church, improvement of their standards, and development of the Church's ministry to public institutions; social worship, assisting dioceses to observe special days, and dramatization of special problems, such as housing or race relations. Pepper believes that a diocesan department has three duties: To prepare a program for the diocese; to serve as a resource for information, and to act as the agent of the bishop and council in hospitals, jails, etc.

The Rev. Brooke Moseley of Washington, director of the Washington department, told how the work is organized there. He stressed the importance of a well-defined diocesan program, the necessity for full backing by the bishop and council, and the value of using experts in the field of social work.

The Rev. Francis McPeek, director of social service of the Washington council of churches and legislative chairman of the social action of Congregational-Christian Churches, spoke on the religious affinity of the Church and labor. He stated that he aligns himself with the late Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Temple, especially as to the centrality of the family in the Christion religion. He urged that the Church concern itself with such matter as child welfare, full employment, and other social problems as they arise.

The Rev. Crawford W. Brown, chief of chaplains of the U. S. veteran's administration, commended the suggested program for ministry to veterans, and commended the program prepared by the National Council's division as the most helpful he has seen. Chaplain Brown has the task of building a corps of 200 full-time chaplains for work in veterans' hospitals. It is planned to have one chaplain for each 500 men, and men of unusually high quality, and of better-than-usual training and experience, are being sought. Preference is given to returned army and navy chaplains. Chaplain Brown regards it as of special importance that clergy of parish churches near veterans' hospitals, shall arrange for a regular ministry to Episcopal Church members.

The group passed the resolution asking for a Bishop for chaplains, and another asking the National Council to appoint the Rev. James Carman to give leadership and help to bishops and departments, in the development of programs of work with veterans in hospitals.

Among the men present were the Rev. Charles W. Sheerin, host to the conference, which met in Epiphany Church; the Rev. Messrs. Brooke Moseley, Edward H. Ehart, Talleyville, Del.; S. C. V. Bowman, Sharon, Pa.; R. C. Batchelder, Lancaster, Pa.; Felix Kloman, Philadelphia; Edward E. Tate, Alexandria, Va.; Thomas B. Smyth, Birdsboro, Pa., Mr. Pepper and Mr. Carman.

Moving Day

San Diego, Calif.:—People of downtown San Diego had the opportunity of witnessing a sight unusual even in highly-motorized California, a church on wheels, when St. James' mission was moved to a new area, under the direction of the dean of convocation, the Rev. Donald Glazebrook.

In 1892 a mission church was built in a then flourishing part of San Diego. Population changes over the years caused a decline in the usefulness of the work. In 1945 the mission was officially closed and on recommendation of Dean Glazebrook permission was secured to move the wooden structure, still in excellent state of preservation, to a rapidly growing part of San Diego, known as Mission Beach, twelve miles from the original site of St. James'. After many delays, due to war-time conditions and the difficulty of moving such a building through a downtown area of a city of 400,000 population, the long journey was finally started and the mission church was in its new location ten days after the building had started on its pilgrimage.

Much comment was caused by the sight of a church moving along the busy streets of a modern city. The constant presence of a large staff of electricians, wire manipulators, experts on housing moving, and traffic policemen was required.

The Men's Club of Dean Glazebrook's parish, St.-James-by-the-Sea, La Jolla, assumed responsibility for the preliminary details necessary for the moving of the building and the subsequent improvements which are to be made now that it is in its new location.

The church will serve a hitherto unchurched area of three thousand people in Mission Beach, together with the area of Pacific Beach with approximately fifteen thousand inhabitants. The new vicar will be associated with Dean Glazebrook.

Large Attendance

Washington: — Dean John W. Suter of Washington Cathedral reported on January 5th that there was a total attendance of 135,312 persons at 1,150 cathedral services in 1945. He also predicted that Americans this year will devote much time to religion and things of the spirit.

The cathedral, which is open to visitors from 9 to 5 o'clock daily, attracted 161,000 pilgrims last year, Dean Suter reported. On Saturdays the rate of visitors was up 72 per cent over 1944. Many thousands were also attracted to organ recitals, lectures, festivals, and special services commemorating historic events.

The College of Preachers, affiliated with the cathedral, in 1945 continued its schedule of preaching conferences for more than 500 clergymen. The college was host, too, for numerous groups such as the World Council of Churches, the Federal Council of Churches, and the United Council of Church Women for discussion of Church unity problems.

Plan Schools

Burlington, Vt.:—The department of religious education of the diocese of Vermont has outlined a program for vacation church schools throughout the state. It is under the direction of the Rev. John B. Midworth, rector at Montpelier.

A three-fold aim has been established: (1) to strengthen the work among children in smaller parishes and missions; (2) to start a program of evangelization in new areas; (3) to attach the isolated children reached through these vacation church schools to the church school by mail.

A further proposal for evangelization was made by the department to be worked out in conjunction with the laymen of the diocese. This will be the use of the radio to present some facts about the Episcopal Church, its history, ritual, and doctrine. Laymen will deliver the addresses over local radio stations and music will be supplied by recordings.

Catholics Resign

Berlin (wireless to RNS):—Andreas Hermes, Berlin Catholic lawyer, has resigned as president of the Christian Democratic Union in Germany, a group composed of remnants of the former Catholic Center Party but open to adherents of all denominations. Walther Schreiber, deputy chairman of the party, has also resigned. Both men will continue as party members. The resignations, according to informants here, were made under pressure from Soviet occupation authorities who are said to regard the Union as the most markedly Rightist of the "Big Four" German parties.

Russian authorities were reported especially critical of the Union's protest against "undemocratic" handling of land reform measures and its subsequent failure to sign a statement advocating help to small landholders granted holdings from dismembered Junker estates.

Press and radio campaigns conducted in the Russian-controlled areas charged that Christian Democratic Union groups had repudiated Hermes as "reactionary." It was said that at a meeting in Berlin on December 21, the Union decided that both Hermes and Schreiber should quit, and their places taken by Jacob Kaiser and Ernest Lemmer, trade union men.

Meanwhile a report from Paris states that the resignations were demanded by delegates of the party in all four occupational zones because of suspicion that the Christian Democratic Union was becoming a cover for pro-fascist elements.

Priest Sentenced

Paris (wireless to RNS):—A Roman Catholic priest, 60-year-old Canon Polimann, has been condemned to five years' solitary confinement by the tribunal of Neurthe-Moselle on charges of collaborating with the Vichy regime during the German occupation. He was accused of writing articles in the Paris magazine, Croix Meusienne, which were said to have discouraged many Catholics from joining the local resistance movement.

For peace to endure, the Church's influence must be more widely and deeply felt, and that depends upon the character of its spiritual leadership.

Men from the armed forces are coming to the Church's seminaries, firm in their purpose to enter the ministry. To prepare them adequately, the seminaries need your generous support.

Catholics Challenged

Budapest (wireless to RNS):—The Roman Catholic Church in Hungary, comprising 70 per cent of the population, is being challenged by sweeping changes in the nation's closely-interlocked economic and social system which tend to undermine its strength and influence. Russian occupation authorities have not attempted to interfere directly in religious affairs, but Hungarian Communists are openly agitating for abrogation of all church-state relations, including abolition of state subsidies to the clergy, and removal of the Church as a vital force in the schools. Already Communists have brought about the nationalization of all but 3,000 of the 478,618 hectares of land formerly owned by the Church. The seizure of church-owned estates was carried through under a program of land reform which was bound to meet with widespread approval in a country where 700,000 peasants are landless and 250,000 have holdings of from only one to two-and-a-half hectares.

Confronted by the loss of revenue-producing property, and deprived of aid from the landed aristocracy, whose estates have also been seized, the Church must now turn to the middle and working classes for means to finance its social institutions and schools. Loss of its land has threatened especially the influence exerted by the Church through its schools. Forty-five per cent of all schools in Hungary are confessional, and 80 per cent of these are Catholic. For the present, the state is paying teachers' salaries, but confessional schools are now without independent resources and their financial plight is beginning to be apparent.

Marriage Clinic

New Orleans (RNS):—Local ministers believe they have one solution for the problem of sky-rocketing divorces in a marriage clinic for this city. Although still only an idea, the ministerial union hopes to make the clinic one of its big projects in 1946. Divorce and separation have become too legion to remain "every couple's own business," the churchmen believe. They substantiate this theory by citing the divorces which numbered in 1944,—2,195 compared to 840 in 1941. And where there were but ten annulments in 1941, there were 105 in '44. Just how many homes have been broken up other than those in which legal divorces and separations have occurred, cannot be determined, but the clergymen believe it to be a high figure.

School Is Honored

Paris (wireless to RNS):—The Institution Notre Dame de Guincamp, Roman Catholic boarding school in Brittany, has been awarded the Croix de Guerre by the French government for the part its teachers and pupils played during the occupation of France. The school was the first building to fly the tricolor after the liberation. According to the official citation, arms left on the school grounds by retreating French troops in 1940 were hidden by the teachers and students and then destroyed so they might not fall into German hands. The institution was searched many times by the Nazis, but this did not prevent French and Allied underground agents from being hidden there. The school was eventually denounced by the Vichy regime as a resistance center and was obliged to vacate the larger part of its properties. The remaining buildings, however, continued to be used as a meeting place for resistance leaders.

Christmas In Moscow

Moscow (wireless to RNS):—Dense crowds packed the Yelokhovsky Cathedral here as Orthodox believers joined in Christmas Eve services. The Christmas festival is traditionally observed in the Eastern Church on January 6, in conformity with the Julian rather than the Gregorian calendar. Many women in the Moscow cathedral fainted as the surging throng followed the colorful liturgy conducted by Patriarch Alexei, supreme head of the Russian Church. Worshippers began gathering from early in the evening and those not able to gain admittance stood outside.

Inside the cathedral the congregation pushed forward to place candles before the altar. All sections of the population were represented, the attendance numbering many men, especially those of middle age. The younger element was composed mainly of girls in their teens and early twenties. Reports from other churches in Moscow as well as throughout Russia also stressed overflow attendances at Christmas observances.

Asia Relief

New York (RNS):—A goal of $1,600,000 in 1946 to aid the people of Asia has been set by the Church committee for relief in Asia in a program designed to help clothe, feed, house and care for millions whose lives have been ravaged by the war. In announcing this cash goal the committee points out that the sum will be supplemented by an expected seven million dollars worth of used clothing.

During the last seven years of the eight years of war in China the committee spent a total of over six and a half million for relief programs and in a single year as many as three million persons received aid.

HENRY K. SHERRILL
The Bishop of Massachusetts

I appreciate your publishing the report of the visit to Germany (WITNESS, Dec. 27) but I wish that some correction could be made in some way. The report was not written by me alone but was a composite report composed by Bishop Oxnam, Dr. Fry and myself and signed by all three. I feel a little embarrassed to be given as the sole author of a report which was entirely a joint production.

ANSWER: We did not keep the original copy from our diocesan correspondent but as we recall it there was nothing to indicate that it was a joint production. We therefore thought it would add weight to the report to by-line it with the name of Bishop Sherrill. We are glad to make the correction.

CORNELIUS P. TROWBRIDGE
Rector at Chestnut Hill, Massachusetts

May I take this opportunity to tell Sgt. James F. Manser how heartily I agree with his letter which appeared in the December 27 issue and to assure him that there are many of the older clergy who will welcome such men as he into the ministry with open arms. We believe that the point of view he represents is the hope of the Church and that it still represents the majority opinion.

PHILIP L. SHUTT
Rector at Belvidere, Illinois

Something should be done by our General Convention which meets this fall about representation on joint committees and commissions. At present, out of an approximate 355 members, 199 may be found concentrated among the clergy and laity of provinces 1, 2, 3, the eastern and largely urban section of America. If to this figure we add the total of 41 in province 4, the southland, the entire half of the country east of the Mississippi is dominated in Church legislation by an urban viewpoint; and what can 41 persons do against 199, even if the south should not be considered anything but rural?

The Diocese of New York has 33 members followed closely by the urban dioceses of Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Washington, and Newark, totalling 104 together.

The Diocese of Chicago, with a representation of 10, perhaps the only really urban diocese in province 5, and the diocese of California in the far west province 8, also largely urban, with 7 members provide no comparison with the east. Virginia, with 10 committeemen and women has the largest representation of province 4 and of the southern dioceses.

Of the 17 missionary districts in America, 4 have no representation and of the remaining 13 the same number, 13, may be found serving on committees and commissions.

The following dioceses seem to have no representation: Dallas, Erie, Lexington, North Texas, Northern Indiana, Northern Michigan, and Quincy. Of this group only Erie is in the east.

Of 67 bishops who serve on committees and commissions, 25 come from the east. The nearest number to this is 16, represented by middle western diocesan leaders. Others: south, 13; west, 11; southwest, 2.

The outlook of the Episcopal church is urban, and it will continue to be so due to two circumstances, the first of which is that it was firmly established in eastern centers and has been poorly established in the other sections of the country. The second circumstance is that as long as Convention and its commissions and committees are dominated by the east, the Episcopal Church will remain narrowed.

At least, a start should be made on better representation. And I have a hunch that many of these bodies need new blood—too many bishops, clergy, and laity, have served too long.

H. J. MAINWARING
Layman of Wollaston, Massachusetts

Sgt. James F. Manser (WITNESS, Dec. 27) writes, "Ask the average Episcopalian in what category he places himself, and he will say the Protestant group."

But let us follow his "average" Episcopalian on a little journey to the "average" Episcopal Church. He has already been baptized by a priest, using a Catholic sacrament, into the Catholic Church. He has been confirmed by a Bishop of the Apostolic Succession and of the same Catholic Church, by the Sacrament of Confirmation. With all the other "average" Episcopalians present he stands, and says publicly that he believes,—and believes in,—"One Catholic . . . Church." Then he receives the Blessed Sacrament of Catholic unity. The entire service is according to one of the great Catholic liturgies, celebrated by a priest. If during the week our "average" Episcopalian becomes ill and sends for the priest, his pastor will pray that they both "may die in the communion of the Catholic Church" (P. 316, Pr. Bk.). And he may even receive the ancient Catholic sacrament of Holy Unction.

No doubt, Sgt. Manser is an "average" Episcopalian. So he, too, does these things,—which Protestants decidedly do not do. Hence, it ill becomes him to denounce our priests who believe they are Catholic priests, teaching the Catholic Faith, in a Catholic Church. They stay where they are because they are right where they are. Sgt. Manser will do well to read the article in your same issue on educated and uneducated Episcopalians.

Church-Related Colleges Face Their Greatest Boom

There is New Emphasis on Social Sciences And Religion in Most Church Colleges Now

By Larston D. Farrar

Washington (RNS): — The 788 Church-related colleges of the nation are faced with the greatest boom period in their history according to Dr. Gould Wickey, executive secretary of the national commission of Christian higher education.

"There seems little doubt that we will see a record number of students —including thousands of returned veterans—in most of the church-related colleges and universities," Dr. Wickey said, "with a noticeable increase to take place next year and for several years to come."

Certain trends brought on by the war and the millions of returning servicemen are now evident in the country's church institutions of higher education, Wickey said. These trends he listed as:

1—Development of a more extensive and intensive program of personal counsel both for veterans and students who have not been in service.

2—A greater emphasis on subjects in the field of social relations—history, sociology and economics, with particular emphasis on international relations.

3—A greater tie-in—scholastically —between all classes in the college and actual world events.

4—A change in the type of personnel—more all-around professors rather than specialists.

5—A new emphasis on the actual college class facilities, with greater care to be shown in architectural beauty and class-room utility.

"The new emphasis on social sciences must be based on a Christian ethic, else it will fail to prepare the veterans and the millions of other students fully for their after-college responsibilities," Wickey declared.

"Sociological teachings apart from Christianity will not have the necessary dynamic to maintain a desire for world peace in this and other countries.

"Instead of simply building a world consciousness, the church-related colleges want to build an ecumenical consciousness among the students. There must be moral, as well as practical, reasons to work actively for a better and a peaceful world ingrained in our students today and tomorrow.

"Professors are being chosen more and more in church-related colleges because they have an overall viewpoint that will help students achieve a better view of the world rather than because they have done much special research in this or that line."

In Cleveland, at the annual meeting of the council of Church boards of education, held last week, Dean C. G. Shatzer of Wittenberg College stated that denominational colleges must be "a part of the great flow of life" and courses in religion must be associated with practice or students will not be impressed.

Dr. Wickey, speaking at this conference, said that "It was headlines when John D. Rockefeller Jr. declared, in making a gift of a million dollars to the World Council of Churches, that the one compelling demand of this age is the rebirth of religion, especially through religious education. The Church is challenged to redouble its efforts in the field of Christian education in order that the whole program of the whole Church may be more effective in developing a Christian personality so necessary for a confused, suffering, and sorrowing world. Fifteen years ago the question was asked, 'For what does Christian education stand?' Imitation of large universities was the daily habit in order to gain more students. Today, the Church-related colleges of America are aware that they have a distinct vocation, no matter what their enrollment, their endowment, and their property value."

OVERSEAS SCHOLARSHIPS ARE OFFERED

New York: — Union Theological Seminary has offered eight foreign fellowships to students from overseas. Each student will receive an award of $1,000 from the Seminary for a year of graduate study and will then return to serve the Church in his own land. These scholarships are in addition to the regular missionary fellowships and scholarships offered annually to leaders of Churches abroad, whether missionaries or nationals.

BISHOP PERRY HONORED

Providence, R. I.:—The Presiding Bishop and Bishop Sherrill of Massachusetts were the speakers at services held on January 6 at St. John's Cathedral to honor Bishop James DeWolf Perry on the 35th anniversary of his consecration. Bishop Perry was consecrated bishop of Rhode Island on January 6, 1911 and was Presiding Bishop from 1930 to 1937. The following day the Auxiliary honored Mrs. Perry at a luncheon and the tribute was climaxed with a dinner in the evening at which Bishop and Mrs. Perry were the guests of honor. Other bishops attending the services were Bishop Budlong and Bishop Gray of Connecticut; Bishop Lawrence of Western Massachusetts and Bishop Bennett, suffragan of Rhode Island.

Patience, Please

★ In recent weeks we have had complaints about the late delivery of THE WITNESS. They come particularly from rectors taking bundles who distribute them at services on Sunday. The publication is mailed, as it has always been, on Monday and Tuesday from Chicago. The matter has been called to the attention of Post Office authorities and it is our hope and belief that the matter will be speedily corrected. Meanwhile if your copy or bundle fails to arrive the week of publication we will appreciate a postal card to THE WITNESS, 135 Liberty Street, New York 6, N. Y. so that we may present the data to the proper Post Office authorities.

CLERGY CONFERENCE ON LABOR

Springfield, Mass.: — The clergy of the diocese of Western Massachusetts held a conference January 13-14 at the Bishop's house on the Church and labor. The leader was the Rev. W. B. Spofford, executive secretary of the Church League for Industrial Democracy. He also preached at the cathedral on the evening of the 13th on tasks before the Church and the following evening was the speaker at the annual meeting of the cathedral parish when his subject was prospects for world peace.

On the 20th and 21st Mr. Spofford addressed groups on the same subject in the diocese of Albany. On Sunday evening he met with students of Russell Sage College and Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute and the following day met with the ministerial association of Troy.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA IN NEED

New York:—Only the Church and other private agencies can help Czechoslovakia, one of the neediest countries in all of Europe, reported Elsie Thomas Cutler, editorial secretary of the Church committee on overseas relief and reconstruction, who has just returned from a four months' investigation of Europe's relief needs.

"Czechoslovakia and Holland were the two hungriest places I saw," Mrs. Culver said. "Yet UNRRA has no direct program of help in Czechoslovakia. This country wrote a contract with UNRRA in a moment of optimistic enthusiasm over liberation, which provides for a supply of goods for commercial use only, for stores or the re-starting of factories. As a result the people, who now have a diet of bread, potatoes and dumplings, and whose babies receive one-sixth of a liter of milk a day, and are wrapped only in whatever newspapers are available, whose children at six have never seen an orange,—can expect no official aid. The Church must see that these people receive aid, food, and clothing in particular, for the people need what money cannot buy in Europe."

BISHOP MOULTON RESIGNS

New York:—The Presiding Bishop has received the resignation of Bishop Moulton of Utah, who states that he does so in order to conform to the constitutional provision that bishops shall resign at 72. He will be 72 in May. The resignation requires action by the House of Bishops at its meeting in September.

DOCTRINE SUBJECT OF LECTURES

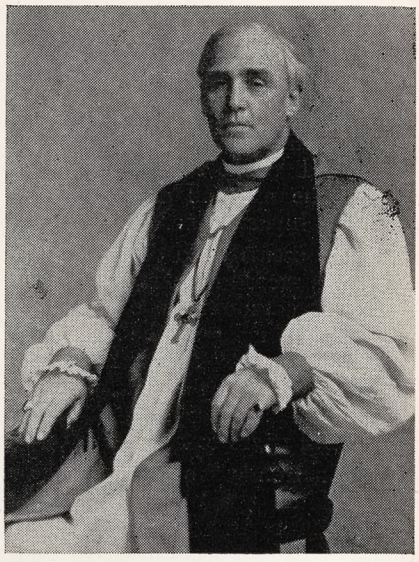
New York:—The Rev. Charles W. Lowry of All Saints', Chevy Chase, Md., gave lectures on the doctrine of the Trinity and the life of devotion at St. Thomas' Church, January 14, 21. A third will be delivered on the 28th. These will be followed on February 4, 11 and 18 by lectures by the Rev. Whitney Hale of the Advent, Boston, on the doctrine of man and the life of devotion. They are sponsored by the Library of St. Bede.

WOMEN STUDENTS AT SEMINARY

Petersburg, Va.:—There are now four women students at the Bishop Payne Divinity School getting special training for Church work. It is the first time that women have been included in the student body.

CANADIAN CHURCH LAUNCHES ADVANCE

Montreal (RNS):—Plans were announced simultaneously in every Anglican church in Canada for the Anglican Advance Appeal for Christ and his Church, which will begin immediately. A financial appeal for $4,300,000 will be made later in the year.



A message from the Most Rev. Derwyn T. Owen, Primate of All Canada, was read to every Church of England congregation in the Dominion at special services of rededication. It stressed that "our Church believes that she has a definite and unique contribution to make to the spiritual life of Canada."

Calling members to "a fuller and richer living of the Christian life, with its exercises of prayer and worship, of love and service, of faith and fellowship," the Primate said the appeal is a "call to every member of the Church to enlist as a worker in building a Christian Canada and a Christian world."

The program of advance will include greater educational hospital work in Canada among the Indians, Eskimos and white settlers, rehabilitation of war-torn mission fields, and consolidation of the Church's work in India. Advance is also planned in social service work, care for superannuated clergy and widows of clergymen, and a share in the reconstruction of Christian churches in England and other parts of Europe.

The first six weeks of the advance will be devoted to diocesan preparation previous to an intensive period of the Dominion-wide spiritual campaign. District services have been called throughout Canada during Epiphany. Laymen will also assemble in special meetings.

A visitation of every congregation and parish for spiritual purposes will be held during the last week of February, and March 3, a Sunday, will be observed as a day of prayer. Three months of special preaching and teaching will then follow.

Archbishop Derwyn T. Owen, primate of the Church of England in Canada, who has issued a call for advance

The financial appeal will be made from May 12 to 19.

The Anglican advance movement completes the roster of the principal Protestant denominations of the Dominion which are currently conducting forward movements.

The United Church of Canada, largest Protestant communion, has a Crusade for Christ and His Kingdom under way, and the Baptist Federation of Canada has a similarly-titled movement. The Presbyterian Church in Canada recently announced plans for its advance. Financial appeals will be linked with each.

Plans were launched in Canada last year by the Canadian Council of Churches for integration of all four movements. Committees have been set up to investigate ways in which each crusade can be coordinated.

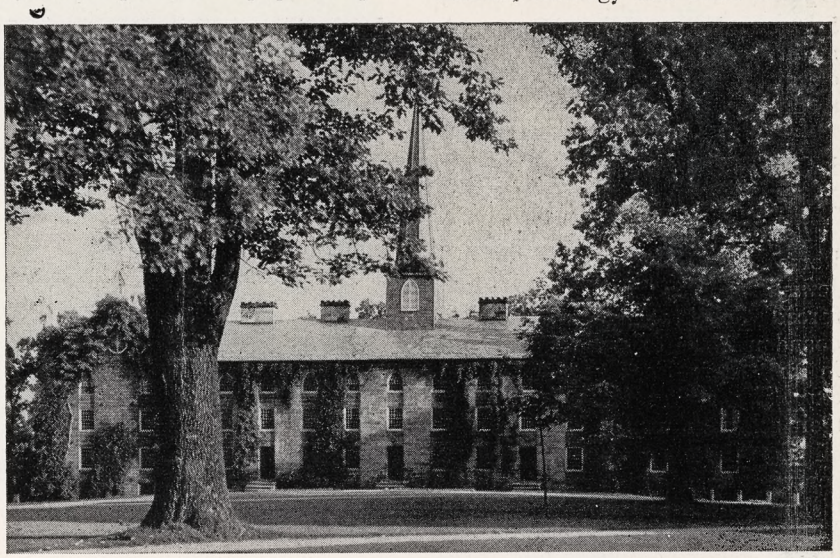
Kenyon College Training Men For Post-War World

Offers Courses in the Sciences and Arts And Also Has Its Own Theological School

By Mary A. Rahming

Gambier, Ohio: — Founded by Philander Chase, the first bishop in the Northwest Territory, Kenyon College is the oldest endowed college for men in the Northwest Territory and has devoted over one hundred years to the education of men. Supported by gifts from England, Kenyon was chartered by Bishop Chase in 1824 as The Theological Seminary of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Ohio, but in 1891 the name was changed to Kenyon College, the name by which it had always been known. It consists of two parts: the College, and the Divinity School of Kenyon College, which takes its name from its principal building, Bexley Hall. Both the College and the Divinity School have deans and faculties of their own; both are presided over by the President of Kenyon College.

For more than a century the College has been closely associated with the Church and has contributed extensively to its leadership. Though the board of trustees is largely self-perpetuating, the Bishops of Ohio and of Southern Ohio are ex-officio members and in alternate years its chairmen.



The College is built upon a hill overlooking the Kokosing Valley in Knox County, near the center of Ohio. Almost all of the students live on campus in ivy-covered dormitories of local sandstone, one of which, Old Kenyon, was built in 1827, the design having been amended by the architect of the Capitol in Washington, Charles Bullfinch. The campus is shaded by trees which were part of the forest when Philander Chase drew up his first plans over a hundred years ago. Collegiate and theological students eat in the high vaulted refectory, named for President Peirce. Through the center of the village of Gambier is a mile-long gravel path, lined with oaks and maples, which runs between Old Kenyon and Bexley Hall. Kenyon, with its students living, eating and studying together, stands in the collegiate rather than the university tradition, and has often been likened to the colleges of Oxford and Cambridge, in England.

There are fewer than nine students to every instructor; classes and seminars are small, and the instructor has time to study the special needs and abilities of his students. The faculty members, although all relatively young, contribute almost constantly to the advancement of their fields of study, and during the war, many of them held positions of responsibility in the army and the navy, and in fields of scientific research. The cloud chamber where the physicist, Dr. Wilson Powell, still on leave of absence doing essential war research, studied cosmic rays, is a piece of equipment possessed by few other colleges in the country. The Kenyon Review, a quarterly of arts and letters, now in its eighth year of publication and edited by Professors John Crowe Ransom and Philip Blair Rice, of the College faculty, is considered one of the outstanding literary publications of the day.

The College is devoted exclusively to liberal education, education designed to help the student make the most extensive and rewarding use of his own mind; liberal education as distinct from professional education is being concerned with freeing the mind. Christian education is a part of liberal education; elective courses in religion and the English Bible and the regular services of the Church provide formal instruction in Christian thought and worship. Similarly, the Seminary curriculum has concentrated the energies of students and faculty on essentials of theological studies, eschewing the less important.

President Chalmers, a firm upholder of the College's liberal tradition, and a believer in modern education as well, was a strong advocate of the idea that colleges during the war should devote themselves to their part in training for war, and at the same time maintain their old academic standards so that men might be trained for the peace as well. To this end, the College initiated and taught the pre-meteorology training program of the army air forces, and contributed to and taught the area and languages courses of the army.

In mathematics, chemistry, political science, history, biology, economics, theology and other fields of study the contributions of the Kenyon faculty to knowledge as well as to teaching have been notable. Socially the student and faculty life at Kenyon is collegiate; intellectually it enjoys much of the excitement and urbanity which characterize the university tradition at its best.

BISHOP KEELER IN BOSTON

Boston:—Bishop Keeler of Minnesota was the headliner at the annual meeting of the diocesan Church Service League, held here at the cathedral on January 8. He spoke on the Reconstruction and Advance Fund. Presiding was Bishop Sherrill who said that he expected every one of the 100,000 persons in the diocese to contribute to the fund or else give a distinct "No." With regard to the millions of persons in the vast movement of population in Europe, Bishop Sherrill said that we would shrink from the horror if all were gathered in one place and an atomic bomb dropped upon them but that he was not sure but that it would be a more merciful death than what these people face if we cannot do more for them. He also said that the chaplain service, for which no separate appeal is being made, is if possible even more necessary now than at any time.

Also addressing the meeting were the Rev. William Crittenden, head of the national youth division, and Mrs. Y. Y. Tsu, wife of Bishop Tsu.

BISHOPS LEAD QUIET DAY

Hartford, Conn.: — Bishop Budlong of Connecticut and Bishop Spencer of West Missouri gave the meditations at a quiet day for the clergy of Connecticut at the cathedral on January 21.

NO DOG RACING IN BOSTON

Boston (RNS):—Joint action by Roman Catholic, Protestant and Jewish religious leaders here has forced dog racing promoters to abandon plans to erect a new track in the Hyde Park section of this city. The racing interests dropped their scheme after the appearance in all the Boston papers of a letter opposing the move, signed by Archbishop Richard J. Cushing; Rev. Ashley Day Leavitt, president of the Boston Council of Churches; Bishop Henry Knox Sherrill of the Episcopal diocese and Bishop Lewis O. Hartman of the Methodist Church.

The public letter was preceded by a meeting in Hyde Park of Congregational, Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian, Episcopalian and Roman Catholic clergymen as well as rabbis at which a general protest mass-meeting was scheduled. On the Sunday following this meeting circulars of protest were distributed at all services. Votes protesting the erection of the track were taken by officials of each church and synagogue. The Holy Name Society of the largest Catholic church held a protest meeting in the evening. These events, culminating in the joint letter carried by the press finally forced the operators to announce that the petition for the oval would not be presented to the city council.

FLETCHER ADDRESSES SOCIAL WORKERS

Springfield, Mass.: — The Rev. Joseph F. Fletcher, professor at the Episcopal Theological School, was the speaker at a luncheon of the council of social agencies here on January 14th. One of the highlights of his address was the suggestion—"demand" would probably be more accurate—that representatives of labor organizations be asked to serve on the various committees of the council. His remarks on the subject were impromptu, following a report on veterans' aid, in which a committee was set up which included representatives of business organizations but where no place was found for labor.

Later in the afternoon and through the evening Mr. Fletcher lead a seminar on social problems which was attended by both clergymen and social workers.

FRENCH BAR AID TO SCHOOLS

Paris (wireless to RNS): — The long-standing dispute between Roman Catholic and leftist groups over the issue of state aid for church schools entered a new phase here when the constitutional committee of the French Constituent Assembly rejected by a 24-15 vote a proposal by the Popular Republican Movement in favor of subsidies. The PRM proposal was intended to nullify a bill passed by the Provisional Consultative Assembly last spring suppressing state aid to non-public schools and outlawing grants paid to Catholic schools during the Vichy regime. The commission's decision is subject to ratification by the French Assembly, and the PRM has announced it will introduce a debate on the subject.

WHITE SPIRITUALS RENDERED

Scarsdale, N. Y.: — Original American hymn tunes known as "white spirituals" were presented at an afternoon service at St. James the Less on January 20. They were sung by Miss Susan Reed who is well known for her interpretation of them. Her songs were the Cherry Tree Coral, The Wayfaring Stranger, I Wonder as I Wander, The Seven Joys of Mary, Kedron and Song of Twelve.

BISHOP SPENCER ON FUND

Hartford: — Bishop Spencer of West Missouri is now holding meetings of clergy and laity in the diocese of Connecticut on behalf of the Reconstruction and Advance Fund. He is spending ten days in the diocese with meetings in each archdeaconry.

Defense Against Atomic Bomb

THE Atomic bomb is the first weapon of victory that has been greeted with misgiving — even penitence—by its discoverers.

We are told that there were more deaths at Hiroshima than the United States army suffered on all fronts during the whole of this war. We ask ourselves if it would not have been better to demonstrate the weapon in a desert or on an uninhabited islet. Some answer that this would have delayed the end and cost more American lives — or that it would not have been appreciated by our enemies. George Washington is quoted by these people: "The object of war is to destroy the enemy." Objectors to war point out that we can destroy an enemy by making him our friend; and the gesture of using the bomb where it would warn without causing wholesale slaughter might have been a death blow to all future wars.

In our humility, we are apt to ask if man is slipping back into suicidal savagery. We doubt it. Our very humility is a new attitude for conquerors to take—it is even hard for us to consider ourselves "conquerors" — and the change is a hopeful one. And making war on civilians, which has been considered unsporting until now, may either mean that we have succumbed to the total frightfulness of a total war, — or that we have discovered that what shouldn't happen to a civilian shouldn't happen to an enlisted soldier either.

At any rate, these questions will doubtless be considered in many sermons and articles in the next few months. There will be a wave of such subjects as "The ..... in the Atomic Age"— and you can insert in place of the dash such words as "Christian," "Church," "Gospel," "Bible," and so forth. Those lured by these up-to-date titles will probably find that the conclusion of the matter is that we need more Christianity, more churchgoing, more brotherly love, or more Bible reading. Novelty seekers may feel that they have been deceived by a timely and novel title affixed to an oft-told tale, but the preachers will be absolutely right. We can find no quarrel with their conclusions, but we think the description of our times as "The Atomic Age" is superficial.

There is no denying that the weapons and cruelties of the past war and its preliminaries have had a tremendous effect on our thinking. One cannot remember the hatreds which have been glorified and even worshipped by large groups in the past ten years, without shuddering. One cannot without awe look forward ten years when it may be possible for one nation to obliterate another nation — by the flip of a switch! When we put this memory and this look into the future together, we not only are grateful that such hatreds and such power did not come at the same time in the same place, but we are made extremely dubious of the survival, not only of civilization, but of all life.

We no longer smile indulgently at Luther's lines:

"What though this world,
with devils filled,
Should threaten to undo us."

We thought we had killed all the devils by science, and now we find we were wrong. It is the scientists themselves who are most disturbed about having atomic force in the world without a moral force to control it.

The atom bomb has made the golden rule a law of survival. It has made universal right thinking the only way of man's safety in this world. It has, indeed, had a terrific effect on our thinking. Let us not forget, however, the effect our thinking can have on the future use of atomic force.

There are stronger forces than atomic energy in our world today. Ideas are much stronger forces: they can contribute more to our future comfort or destruction than atomic force. But let us keep "down to earth" and consider simply the power of ideas for good or evil, in whatever way they are spread: by speech, writing, pictures, symbols, or insinuation.

The pen is mightier than the sword. We would rather be struck by a pen than a sword, but the pen can command the sword to kill me. History is full of penmen who have refused to flinch in the face of swordsmen — Socrates, St. Paul, St. Ignatius, Wyclif, Tyndale, Cranmer; we can all think of dozens of others — but in history we hear of

A TRULY noble man may be defined as one who stands by a good cause or organization even after he knows a lot about it! There are too many tired radicals with high ideals, but who lack the fortitude to remain active in a movement after they discover its imperfections. To stay in such an organization, and yet keep alive the fires of self criticism and purification from within, is perhaps the most difficult task of the social or religious idealist.

We would rather listen to a speech of Hitler's than be struck by any kind of bomb, atomic or other. But it was the radio broadcasts from Berlin and Rome that spawned the buzz bomb, the two-ton bomb, and eventually, the atom bomb. The radio, motion picture, printing press, and camera do not owe their existence to the weapons of warfare; they are not derived from the sword or musket. But they have helped make necessary, or possible, or inevitable, every armament that has been developed in our days.

Ideas — words — precede action. Satan used words on Eve; that was enough. Cain spoke to Abel before he killed him. It has always been so.

If the Churches will realize that this is a propaganda age, and can use all methods of spreading their ideas while there is time, we shall have all the defense we need against the atom bomb in all its improvements. The Nazis made strong, simple, worshipful, effective motion pictures; the Church could have done the same thing, without the handicap of hypocrisy. It must seek to do so now. It must sponsor, or inspire, radio broadcasts which are not merely harmless, but which improve relationships between classes, races, and religions.

"The Church must do this." We cannot dismiss the matter there, for these things cannot be done by the clergy or by a National Bureau. They must be done by laymen trained in these fields of propaganda, and used to thinking religiously about community and world problems. There's the rub. We have plenty of trained laymen, but very few who are used to any sort of intellectual religious life. They are satisfied with one sermon a week, with hearing a couple of passages from the Bible. They read magazines, but not Church magazines. They read books, but not religious books. They see dramas with social significance, but the Churches appear in these plays as a somewhat odorous fossil.

Man would have no words, no ideas, to pit against the senseless, heedless fury of the atomic bomb were it not for the fact that God has spoken first. But for him to speak through us to all the world, more of us must listen to him and speak in our various ways for him.

The price of defense against atomic force is a little more thought on the part of all of us. The events of the next twenty years will indicate whether Christians have thought that price too high for them to pay.

Unity and Prayer

AS OUR parishioners return from the battlefield they come frequently to their clergy to ask what is being done by the Church to bring groups of men together. They have a vague sense that this was the cause for which they were fighting, and often their questions deal with the specific point of unity between the Presbyterians and ourselves. It is easy enough for us to tell them that this delicate and complicated proceeding is in the hands of a commission of both churches, but that answer doesn't seem to satisfy them.

We don't think that the majority of these men require that anything should be done hastily, but those of them who do know about this inspired and daring proposition are quite discouraged to hear it mentioned so infrequently, and with so little optimism.

We ask if there is any possibility of the issuance of a prayer by our commission which could be used in our churches, and which would give these young men and women some assurance that at least we feel seriously enough about reunion to pray for it, and more than that, to pray for it in specific terms.

The ignorance and consequent indifference to this matter, which depresses them so greatly, is to be found in the members of the Presbyterian Church as well as among our own, and it would seem that if both Churches could agree on a similar prayer, it would raise our hopes and elevate the general level of discussion about this matter. If it is God's will that the Churches should reunite, and if it is God's will that nothing valuable should be lost to either Church in the process, then God will somehow make this possible, and the best thing that we can do is tune our minds to his.

It seems to us that a prayer common to both Churches, and uttered every week in both Churches, would help us all out immensely in this matter. We therefore urge our Commission to investigate this possibility.

FRANK H. NELSON OF CINCINNATI by Warren Herrick. Cloister Press. $1.

The life and influence of Frank H. Nelson on his parish, his community, and the national Church, is something to inspire all of us. Here is an example of how a liberal clergyman might work in society. He met the challenge of his day. And it is for some of the younger clergy who think themselves beyond this sort of "social service" and "civic righteousness" to take heed, and to do something, rather than just preach "doom" and "judgment." Frank H. Nelson was a liberal, but liberal with convictions. He could stand before an interfaith audience and say, "Let's be honest! I believe in the Lord Jesus Christ." And then proceed to say that he would like all Jews to become Christians without the audience resenting his frankness. He was not afraid of wearing a necktie, and he could refer to himself as "the last of the black Protestants." And yet he had nothing but scorn for any narrow-minded points of view, and could say, "There is no one so narrow as the broad-minded liberal."

One amusing quotation from the book, "After Mr. Nelson's exchange with the rector of St. Paul's Church, Rome, Italy, in 1912, a certain dowager commented, 'Mr. Lowrie's sermons make me feel comfortable, but Mr. Nelson makes me feel a miserable sinner'."

It's terribly hard for us today to think of Walter Lowrie's sermon making anybody feel comfortable. And I am sure that would be far from his intention, even in 1912.

Talking It Over

By
W. B. SPOFFORD

IF YOU are not interested in civil liberties and the American Civil Liberties Union then stop right here. For a good many years I have met Mondays with a group of citizens as a member of the board of directors. I have now resigned and since I have been there as a representative of the Church, at least that part of it that makes up the membership of the CLID, I owe it to them to say why I have resigned. This is the most convenient way to do it.

There are three reasons. First, there are about 6,500 persons who pay dues to the organization. Efforts were made by members of the national committee of the organization, largely under the leadership of Dr. Alexander Meiklejohn, former president of Amherst College, to give these dues-payers some voice in the affairs of the organization. Nothing came of it. Actually only those persons are members of the ACLU, by its by-laws, who are either members of the national committee or the board of directors. The thousands of others who pay money to keep the organization functioning have no voice whatever in its affairs. The reason for this undemocratic set-up has been frankly stated by some members of the board and apparently is subscribed to by a majority of the board—fear lest the ACLU be "captured." To me that is exactly as though the franchise should be denied an overwhelming majority of the citizens of the U.S. for fear they might "capture" the government. The ACLU talks a lot about "anti-democratic objectives and practices" on the part of others, including labor organizations, as you will see from the next paragraph. Yet the organization is itself guilty of such practices; what's more I am persuaded that nothing can be done about it. A good try was made by top-ranking people and failed.

Two, the ACLU recently passed a bill which they contend is for the purpose of promoting democracy in trade unions. Efforts are now being made to have it introduced in Congress and in state legislatures. In my judgment this bill constitutes a threat to the very existence of labor unions, thus placing the ACLU on the side of those working for the Ball-Burton-Hatch bill and other anti-labor bills now before Congress. This ACLU bill, if it became law, would place limitations on the entire conduct of a union's internal affairs. The language is so broad, applying to elections, appointments, finances, etc., that it is doubtful if unions could administer their affairs at all since most every action could potentially tie them up in months and years of litigation. The approval of such a bill by people seriously concerned with the continuance of unions and collective bargaining, as members of the ACLU board have always claimed to be, seems to me inexcusable.

Three, the all important issue before us today is the world-wide struggle between fascists and the people. This fight has now developed to the point where it seems to me absurd for a person who is an anti-fascist to defend the "rights" of a man like Gerald L. K. Smith and others of his kind. For Roger Baldwin, as director of the ACLU, to report to the directors with what seemed to me a great deal of satisfaction, that he has conferred with Smith (who was incidentally accompanied by a gunman according to Baldwin) in a Detroit hotel and had assured him that the ACLU would defend his "rights" was to me revolting. The liberal absolutes and legal hair-splitting of the ACLU has meant in recent years that it has on occasions been used by the fascist-minded people. In any case, for me, the struggle of the people throughout the world for freedom and justice is far more important than defending the "rights" of people who are obviously the enemy of the people in this struggle.

The ACLU certainly has, over a long period of years, functioned effectively in many cases. Today however, in spite of some good work, I am convinced that it is both undemocratic and anti-labor. Therefore, being no longer in sympathy with the spirit and viewpoint of a majority of its board of directors, it is clear that I no longer belong on the board. I have therefore severed my connection with it.

The Living Liturgy

By MASSEY H. SHEPHERD, JR.
Professor at Episcopal Theological School

"Quires and Places Where They Sing"

THERE has just come into my hands a little booklet of 86 pages entitled In Every Corner Sing. It is written by Dr. Joseph W. Clokey of Miami University, Oxford, Ohio, and published by Morehouse-Gorham. If every clergyman, organist and chorister would invest a half-dollar in this booklet, and study and apply its practical, concrete suggestions, the dividends in the improvement of music in our churches would be enormous. And don't think that it is too technical. It is written for people who are not experts, and except for one brief chapter on "The Accompanimental Voices of the Organ," any layman in the pew can understand it. For my own part, I am going to put it on the list of required reading in my seminary course in church music.

Dr. Clokey gives some very wholesome advice about what constitutes good church music. It is not simply good music. It is good music which contributes to worship. Much good religious music, even great religious music is more suited to a concert than to a worship service. Any music (just as any church musician) which calls attention to itself and diverts the worshipper from his main business is an abuse. There is no suggestion here of relaxing standards. While admitting that even competent critics often disagree regarding the quality of particular pieces of music, Dr. Clokey goes on to say: "The purpose of worship is to elevate, not to degrade. The quality of the music used should be above rather than below the cultural level of the congregation. If the music seems to be 'over your head' the best plan is to raise your head."

The important point is made that corporate worship requires a different kind of music from that employed in other functions of the church's program. "Gospel songs, revival hymns, songs of religious sentiment, spirituals, religious folksongs—these all had their origin in the informal, personal type of service. This is their natural habitat and this is where they are used to best advantage. They are not only inappropriate but ineffective in corporate worship. The rules of good manners usually have a practical background. If you eat mashed potatoes with a knife you may cut your mouth." Well said. I have often pondered whether one reason there are many hypocrites in the Church is that we have forced them to it by asking them to fill their mouths with gushing sentiments which they have never experienced in their hearts. I am not competent to judge whether pump-priming is a sound device in economics, but I am pretty certain it will not work in corporate worship.

No part of Dr. Clokey's little manual is more valuable than his advice to small choirs not to attempt to imitate a cathedral choir. It hasn't the same resources. It ought to face its limitations honestly, and accept them as a challenge. Elaborate and difficult music is not necessarily the best. He points to the analogy of the symphony and the string quartet. Some worship-music "is like chamber-music and is heard to best advantage when done by a small group in a small building. A small choir—even a volunteer one—can attain a precision and unanimity that is difficult with a large chorus." When choirs, or even congregations, consider the "complexity" of a piece of music as a guide to its quality, they are indulging in what Dr. Clokey calls "a species of vanity."

His hints to organists and choirmasters ought to be memorized, and recited (like the Ten Commandments) 'at least one Sunday in each month.' But I shall pass by any comment upon them to call attention to the last chapter on "Education in Church Music." Dr. Clokey is absolutely right in insisting that the place to begin is in the Church School. Children should learn the noblest hymns and best liturgical music there. Until we build our musical program on a long-time scale, and stop thinking solely in terms of immediate results, we are wasting our time.

Freedom and Jazz

by Randolph Crump Miller
Professor at the Divinity School of the Pacific

SAID William James: "My first act of free will is to believe that I am free." All men act as if they are free. They may have theories of various kinds which deny freedom, but they behave as free men.

One may say that God is the ruler of all, that God knows what we are going to do before we do it, that we are predestined to our end; but the men who say this still act as if they are free. Psychologists may talk about behaviorism, which is the theory that men act according to their reaction to environment, in terms of stimulus and response, without freedom; but the psychologists are still free to write books about it. Hitler may have believed that all men in the conquered countries were slaves; but the men of Norway, Holland, and Czechoslovakia proved Hitler wrong before our armies did. We know we are free. But what is freedom?

Freedom must be distinguished from license. I am able to shoot my neighbor—in fact, neighbors do get shot. Is that real freedom? Or I can get drunk so that my friend has to take me home and put me to bed and I suffer from a hangover the next day. Or I can stand up in church and make insulting remarks to the preacher. I can do some act of treason against my country; I can betray my family; I can even commit suicide. Are these acts of real freedom? I can do these things; there is no doubt about that. These things are done everyday.

I am also able to think in similar ways. Perhaps I think I am President Truman, or Hitler, or Napoleon, or even Jesus Christ. People think that way. But are they free?

A good illustration of real freedom can be found in an old fashioned jazz band. The soloist can improvise on the theme as he goes along. He may improvise on the melody, as most of them do. He can bring in new musical ideas, provided that he keeps within the structure of a simple melody. He may go so far as to improvise on the harmony, as Bix Beiderbecke used to do, and this may be a spectacular variation. Good jazz is based on these improvisations, which are due to the imagination and ability of the soloist. He is a creative artist within a corporate body. But once he breaks the pattern, or decides to play in a different key, or goes into the wrong rhythm, or plays out of turn, the musical structure is broken and it ceases to be good jazz.

The distinction we are making is between freedom and license: license goes beyond the structure, the pattern, the form—in music, morals, or any other human activity. We can break the laws of music, morality, or logical thought; but that is not real freedom. It puts us outside the basic pattern of life.

When we break the laws of music we cease to be free musicians. When we break the laws of morality we end up in jail. When we break the laws of thought we are placed in confinement. I may be Napoleon, an excellent musician who always plays a different tune, and who has murder as a sideline; that is a possibility. But if I insist upon these things, I end up by sacrificing my real freedom.

Have I denied real freedom? Some would say that if freedom is restricted to certain patterns we are not free at all. The patterns of environment and inheritance make us what we are. We are determined by the strongest motive and that comes from outside us. Yet two children in the same family are not the same. Even identical twins have many differences. If there could be real duplication of every influence, two people would still be different and would end up making different choices. Our freedom is limited by external circumstances, by the freedom of others, and by the power of God. But we are free.

TODAY, we are likely to think in terms of political freedom. It can be very narrowly circumscribed without being destroyed. Niemoller rotted in a concentration camp for eight years, but Hitler never was able to destroy his influence. All the demons of storm trooper control did not prevent the deaths of Nazi leaders. All the stormings of a Quisling did not keep the pastors of Norway from resigning. Bishop Berggrav never ceased to be a power in Norway.

On the other hand, so-called "rugged individualism" is not real freedom. Here in America we have frequently substituted license for freedom. "Every man for himself!" has been the cry. Industry has demanded absolute license — what they called "freedom from government interference"—and they may get it again during reconversion if they have their way. During the San Francisco Conference foreign delegates from democratic countries were shocked by the license of the American press in its deliberate misinterpretation of Russian motives. Yellow journalism in America, with its complete irresponsibility, is not true freedom of the press; it is license. We have been free to do what we pleased, say what we pleased, and the devil take the hindmost.

The United States in the years 1920-1929 and Germany in the years 1933-1945 have been at opposite poles — the one demanding the type of freedom that was really license, and the other using political tyranny to deny every type of freedom. Our jazz band illustration can be used here. Germany tried to put the band in a straight jacket, where no improvising was allowed. Even the tune was set. Everyone played the same tune with great monotony. It is bad jazz and worse politics. (It is no accident that jazz music was barred by Hitler).

In America, however, everyone was his own soloist, announcing his own tune. There was no one to keep the rhythm. There was no one playing in the background. Everyone played as he pleased. This breaks the laws of jazz and the laws of freedom. It is sheer license.

The nations during the pre-war era carried this idea even further. There was not even an orchestra. Each nation was its own soloist, and he stayed in his original position and played his own tune. Once in a while two or three soloists got together but they never once were really in tune. Each soloist was protecting his own sovereignty. The Big Three never had the empathy, the feeling for doing the same thing together, that one finds in the Benny Goodman trio.

Political freedom needs organization to be real freedom. There must be a structure, there must be laws and there must be limitation of sovereignty, — so that all shall have the greatest possible freedom. Freedom is not license; and democracy is not anarchy.

In wartime, this became obvious. Our freedom, as we call many of our frivolities, was limited by the necessity of maintaining national life. We were willing to give up many things in the name of national security. We sought the theme of national unity and our solo flights were kept within the scope of this limited theme. The press accepted voluntary censorship, industry accepted with some grumbling government control, the pulpit served national morale, the people adjusted themselves to rationing. We still had some freedom to improvise, but the theme became limited to a single one.

Freedom was thus seriously curtailed, but not lost. It could have been lost, if we had lost sight of the meaning of freedom. It is one thing to sacrifice certain rights; it is another to use this as a means for permanently eliminating the freedom of some groups.

In Deuteronomy, there is this arresting clause: "Love ye therefore the stranger, for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt." The real test of what freedom means lies in how we treat the aliens in our midst. The internment of Japanese-Americans may have been a military necessity; but all the tenets of fascism were used in the threat to revoke their citizenship. This is the way to kill freedom. The fact that the fair employment practices commission should be opposed by southern Senators shows that we have not yet learned to provide freedom for minority groups. There is no real freedom unless it is freedom for all; all men are born free and equal in the sight of God; this is the freedom we must defend at all costs.

FREEDOM is always a half-way house between slavery and license. We are not free when we are slaves of other men; we are not free when our freedom hinders the freedom of other men. None is free unless all are free.

We have distinguished between freedom and license in the psychological, moral, and political realms. In religion, this same distinction holds good.

We talk about the sovereignty of God. God is Lord of history and ruler of the world. Yet we are created free and equal—under God.

We are free to ignore God. We have license to be as the younger son in the parable of the two lost sons. We can turn from God. But in so doing we strike a discordant note in the orchestra of God's kingdom. We cease to be an effective member of the orchestra. To turn from God is to sin. And we all do this.

On the other hand God does not demand that all men be alike. We are called to different tasks. God sets the theme, but we have freedom to improvise on the theme. The man who buried his talent and was condemned for it was the man who refused to improvise. The theme is found throughout Scripture: "Be ye therefore perfect, as your father in heaven is perfect," says Jesus. "Let justice roll down as waters, and righteousness as a perennial stream," cries Amos. This is God's structure, this is the pattern of his kingdom, this is the theme of his orchestra. Within it we have freedom to play our parts, to select our own improvisations, to adapt the tune to the city, or country, or backwoods, or to transcribe it for international relations. We make real choices.

We have real freedom — which is not license, not anarchy, not sin. We have real freedom which is not completely preconditioned, that cannot be overruled entirely even by the tyranny of fascism and that is not destroyed by the sovereignty of the God of history. We have freedom within the structure of man's nature, within (for Americans) the pattern of democracy, and within the purposes of God himself who is the only one who can overrule our freedom. There is a great orchestral pattern and yet we can improvise on many themes within that pattern. That is our real freedom.

Study Shows Church Attendance Is On the Upgrade

Forty-two Per Cent of Nation's Population Attends Church Once a Week Survey Shows

Edited by Sara Dill

Denver (RNS):—Forty-two per cent of the nation's population goes to church or synagogue at least once a week, and 64 per cent at least once a month, according to a survey just completed by the national opinion research center of the University of Denver here. Investigation on a proportional sampling basis by the center also disclosed that only 16 per cent reported they never went to church. A few of these qualify their absence with the statement that they used to go to church but are prevented from doing so now because of ill health or similar reasons.

A like survey taken a year ago revealed almost the same percentages when the identical question showed 65 per cent attending church at least once a month and 18 per cent seldom or never.

Catholics are the most regular church attendants, 69 per cent reporting that they go to church at least once a week. Only 36 per cent of the Protestants and nine per cent of the Jews do as well.

A further breakdown shows that Negroes appear to be more consistent in their religious devotions than whites, women than men and farmers than urbanites. Eighty-seven per cent of the Negroes say they go to church at least once a month while seven per cent state they never go. Among the whites, the figures are 61 per cent and 17 per cent.

Seventy per cent of the women go at least once a month while only 56 per cent of the men state they attend over the same period. Of the farmers, the percentage is 73, for city residents 59.

Sectionally the figures for attendance at least a month are: New England and Middle Atlantic States—63; South—77; Midwest—62; Rocky Mountain and Pacific states—44.

The largest percentage saying they never attend religious services are Jews (31 per cent), residents of the Rocky Mountain and Pacific areas (26 per cent), and men (22 per cent).

Clergy Endorse FEPC

Cleveland:—The Episcopal clergy of this city, meeting January 7, endorsed the federal fair employment practices bill, now before Congress. Declaring that it was vital to the welfare of the country and a proper implementation of Christian principles, the resolution was sent to Senator Taft and Senator Huffman with the request that they support it. The resolution was presented by the Rev. John C. Davis of St. Andrew's, was seconded by the Rev. James A. Midgley of All Saints', and the Rev. Andrew S. Gill of Emmanuel Church assisted in framing it.

Church Convocation

Durham, N. C.:—A distinguished group of Church leaders are to gather at Duke Divinity School, February 11-13, to discuss the task of the Church in post-war reconstruction. Among them are the Rev. Henry Sloane Coffin, Methodist Bishop Oxnam, the Rev. Reinhold Niebuhr of Union Seminary, John Foster Dulles, chairman of the Federal Council's commission on peace.

Artist Is Dead

Boston: — Charles J. Connick, stained glass artist, died recently. His windows, described as symbols of light and color, have been placed in churches in many parts of the world.

Council of Churches

Dallas, Texas: — Initial steps toward organizing a council of Churches in this city were taken at a recent meeting of the local pastors association.

Army Surplus

New York:—The relief agency of the World Council of Churches has bought a half million dollars' worth of army surplus goods in Europe. It includes shoes, blankets, clothing, cooking utensils, medicines and several jeeps. The agency expects to spend fifty million dollars in an over-all program of relief and reconstruction in the next five years.

Money to Europe

New York: — In response to an urgent cabled appeal from the World Council of Churches, the Reconstruction and Advance Fund has sent its first substantial contribution for relief to Europe. The sum of $50,000 was sent last week.

Tax on Churches

Regina, Canada: — The Anglican church in Saskatchewan has vigorously protested the plan of several cities in the province to tax church property to pay for such city services as fire and police protection, street lighting and maintenance. Petitions have been filed with the various city councils.

Rt. Rev. E. H. Knowles, bishop of the diocese of Qu'Appelle, told Regina city council the Anglican church would be crippled in its work if it were taxed.

The matter of assessing tax-exempt property has been under consideration by the cities since an amendment to the city act was passed at the 1945 session of the provincial legislature. The amendment gives cities the power to make special levies on tax-exempt properties.

The total value of church property of all denominations in Regina is $562,000, which would yield a revenue of $5,500 if the special assessment permitted under the act was levied. Bishop Knowles said the extra money from the assessment of church property would only mean that non-church goers would have their taxes reduced.

Needs of Others

Burlington, Vt.:—The needs of people in liberated countries was stressed during the Christmas and Epiphany seasons in the diocese of Vermont, under the direction of the social service department. At St. Stephen's, Middlebury, the children, following their Christmas party, brought gifts of clothing, canned foods and medicines. At Trinity, Rutland, not only did the children bring gifts but the collection is being continued with a barrel placed in front of the church. At St. Paul's, Burlington, special prayers and litanies are being sent out and each week during the Epiphany season a different part of the world is stressed: Great Britain; Russia and Scandinavia; France, Holland and Belgium; Greece and the Balkan states; Germany and Italy; China and the Orient. On Sundays the prayers are being offered by a member of the congregation whose background is from the nation for whom the prayers are said.

Religion of Students

Madison, Wis. (RNS):—The clearest picture ever obtained of what happens to the religious faith of students while attending the University of Wisconsin will be presented to the faculty soon. It will indicate that religious faith remains unchanged or is strengthened in an overwhelming majority of cases.

Student replies to a questionnaire designed to aid the faculty in making curriculum changes provide the details of this picture. The questionnaire, circulated last year and answered by nearly one-fourth of all of the students enrolled in the university, showed that 56 per cent of the pupils recorded their religious beliefs as unchanged, 24 per cent strengthened, 13 per cent weakened, and 7 per cent changed.

Wisconsin has a constitutional prohibition against sectarian instruction in its state university. Nevertheless, the school at times has been accused by persons of being a hotbed of atheism, communism and other isms. In view of those circumstances, the results of the student questionnaire are considered especially significant.

The 341 students who reported that their religious faith had been strengthened while attending the school credited the change to social contacts with other students, independent reading, courses, informal discussions with instructors, and increase of church affairs and relationships.

General Patton Memorial

Beverly Farms, Mass.: — A memorial service in honor of General George S. Patton Jr., was held recently at St. John's here. It was a fitting tribute to one whose life had been tied to the parish as a former vestryman and the church in which both he and his two daughters were married. The service was conducted by the Rev. A. Abbott Hastings, rector, assisted by the Rev. W. F. A. Stride, rector at Hamilton and Wenham, and the Rev. Cornelius A. Wood of New Bedford, Bishop Patton's nephew.

German Church

London (wireless to RNS):—The Church is the only group in Germany which shows "any real sign of understanding democratic and representative government," Walter Robert Matthews, Dean of St. Paul's, declared here in the Spectator. He was a member of a British church delegation which recently toured Germany. "Amid all the ruin and desolation," Dean Matthews wrote, "there are two creative forces which Hitler was unable to destroy — the church and the universities. The best news out of Germany is that they are alive and vigorous. With wise assistance by the Allies, they can lead the German people into a new era."

Stressing the hopeful attitude of the churches, both Protestant and Catholic, Matthews said that "the congregations which crowd shattered, heatless, windowless and roofless churches are evidence enough that Christianity is alive."

"Church leaders," he added, "would hesitate, I think, to speak of a religious revival, but there are at least potentialities of one."

Dean Matthews revealed that during his visit to Germany he met a group of a hundred theological students who only a few months previously had been officers in the German army.

Go For the Dogs

London (wireless to RNS):—Britain's dog racing fans bet an equivalent of more than half the amount of the recently negotiated loan with America during the war years according to estimates by the British Council of Churches. Starting in 1938, the gambling boom ran right through the war years, and official figures of amounts taken at the betting windows show 70,452,961 pounds laid out in 1944, a jump of 90 per cent over the 1938 total.

These amounts, however, do not include those wagered with bookmakers which probably equalled the official figures. This would bring the total sum bet on the dogs to 140,000,000 pounds (about $560,000,000) for 1944.

Agencies Merge

Philadelphia (RNS):—Merger of three interdenominational agencies here into a Philadelphia Council of Churches has been proposed, to carry out a more adequate and effective religious program in this city and vicinity.

The three bodies involved in the plan are: The Federation of Churches, organized in 1908; the Sunday School Council of Christian Education, incorporated in 1922; and the Women's Interdenominational Union, incorporated in 1923.

If the proposal is approved, as expected, a new executive secretary will be chosen, with two associate secretaries, one of whom will be a woman.

Visit New Jersey

Trenton, N. J.: — Bishop Oliver Hart of Pennsylvania and Bishop Oliver Loring of Maine visited in the diocese of New Jersey from January 8 to 18 on behalf of the Reconstruction and Advance Fund.

Bible Reading Crusade

St. Paul, Minn.:—All but ten of this city's 150 Protestant churches took part in a 15-day Bible crusade which resulted in 50,000 St. Paul people reading a chapter of the Gospel of John daily and in their memorizing a verse of each chapter. Thousands of book marks, special bulletins, survey cards, reading schedules, and copies of directions on how to read the Bible were distributed.

The crusade is not ended. Mr. Taylor, general secretary of the American Bible Society, pointed out that a number of groups and churches will continue a daily Bible reading schedule. In fact two thousand young people, affiliated with the St. Paul Council of Churches youth group, have pledged daily reading.

Schools in France

Paris (wireless to RNS):—The Roman Catholic hierarchy of France has announced it will oppose "by every means in our power" attempts to embody "atheistic or materialistic philosophies" in the new constitution which will be submitted to the French parliament during the next few months. The bishops' warning was contained in a report on religious and educational issues likely to be settled under the projected constitution.

"France is called upon," the bishops declared, "to choose between the neo-paganism of materialistic doctrines and the principles of Christian civilization for which the Allies fought. Although the Church has nothing to say about matters which are pure techniques of political or economic structure, it is the bishops' duty to make the Church's voice heard on the questions of philosophy implied in the new constitution."

Citing Catholic doctrines regarding human dignity, the bishops maintained that society should place itself at the service of the human beings which compose it and guarantee them certain rights. These rights, the bishops asserted, include the right to practice one's religion freely and the family's right to choose the type of school to which children should be sent.

The bishops' reference to schools was obviously prompted by discussions as to whether church schools should continue to be subsidized under the new constitution as in the past. During the Vichy regime, subsidies were given to Catholic schools in order to win support for its policies, but these were withdrawn last summer under pressure from Communist and Socialist elements. The question is expected to take on major importance when the new constitution is debated. The Popular Republican Movement is in favor of renewing the subsidies, but the Communist Party is strongly opposed to any form of state aid for non-state schools.

Oppose Conscription

Parkville, Mo. (RNS):—The Rev. Carlyle Adams, editor of the Presbyterian Tribune, has resigned as chaplain of Park College here to become director of the newly organized National Council Against Conscription. A national mass education campaign is planned.

Roanoke Rector Is Dead

Roanoke, Va.:—The Rev. Alfred R. Berkeley, rector of St. John's here since 1926, died on December 26 after an illness of two weeks. He was a deputy to ten General Conventions, representing the diocese of Southwestern Virginia at the last six. In this city he had been particularly active in community welfare and social service work.

French Protestants

Paris (wireless of RNS):—Strict neutrality of state-supported schools in religious matters was urged by the Protestant Federation of France in a resolution adopted at the close of its general assembly at Nimes. The sessions were attended by 120 Reformed, Lutheran, Free Church and Baptist clergymen.

The Federation called upon the government to draft new legislation defining the rights of the state and of parents in regard to religious education. It urged that time for religious instruction be reserved to families and churches.

Equal Treatment

New York (RNS):—Subsidies for education in the Belgian Congo, heretofore monopolized by the Roman Catholic Church, will be shared by Protestant mission schools if present plans of Belgium's new government are carried out, it was reported here by the Rev. Emory Ross, secretary of the Foreign Missions Conference.

Although in theory no discrimination exists on denominational grounds in the Belgian Congo, in practice, it was said, Roman Catholic missions have received the benefit of state grants which now amount to 37,000,000 francs per year.

The question of subsidies, however, is "only one element" in the equal treatment of Protestants and Roman Catholics, Ross declared. Efforts are also being made to obtain official recognition by government agencies and private industries for graduates of Protestant schools. Up till now, holders of Protestant diplomas have not always had the same opportunities of employment as Roman Catholics, Dr. Ross said.

Another proposed reform, to be carried out next year, is the establishment of non-Catholic schools for European children in the Congo. It is possible that arrangements may be made, according to Dr. Ross, for Protestant educational missionaries to cooperate in this project.

Dr. Ross visited England, France, Belgium, and Portugal last spring in the interest of post-war mission activities, and at that time conferred with Belgian authorities on a liberalized policy toward Protestant missions in the Congo.

Years of Service

Williamstown, Mass.:—It isn't often that a man retires from the active ministry and then returns to serve the same parish. But when the Rev. A. Grant Noble went into the navy as a chaplain right after Pearl Harbor, the Rev. J. Franklin Carter immediately volunteered to take his place until his return. Dr. Carter had previously been rector of St. John's for forty years. What his service to the parish is, is shown in some measure in a letter recently received by Bishop Lawrence from Willard E. Hoyt, a vestryman who was a member of the parish when Dr. Carter first came to Williamstown:

"From the very beginning of his work here to its end," writes Mr. Hoyt, "he devoted himself with the utmost enthusiasm not only to the parish but also to the life of the community, and was held in the highest esteem and respect by every one with whom he came in contact.

"Taking up the work where Mr. Sedgwick had left off, he continued it, expanding it to meet the growing needs of the parish. I think he was particularly interested in the life of the younger people, and his development of the Church school and young people's organizations was outstanding.

"Never once did he fail us, never once was there any criticism of his policies. And as the years went on, more and more he won the love and respect of every one with whom he came in contact. His home was immediately open to us all, and the charm and loveliness of his family life made it a Mecca not only for the older people, but for the younger members of the parish as well. His ideals were of the highest, and the influence of his personal life grow upon us all through the years.

"Williams College conferred upon him the honorary degree of doctor of divinity, and in the citation which was used by the dean of the college who presented his name for the honor, the following lines from The Canterbury Pilgrims were quoted:—

" 'Christ's lore, and that of His Apostles Twelve he taught,
But first he followed it himself.'

"I do not think that anything could more aptly describe his work and life, nor could I attempt to say more, save that when our present rector became a chaplain in the navy, Dr. Carter immediately volunteered to carry on in the parish until Mr. Noble's return. This he is doing with his usual unselfish devotion and success."

As great as his service has been to Williamstown and the parish there, it should be added that Dr. Carter has always shown great concern for national and international affairs and has been one of the most loyal members of the CLID from its founding in 1919.

DANIEL E. WILLARD
Layman of Nebraska City, Nebraska

The pronouncement of Bishop Tucker anent daily Holy Communion leads me to exclaim, probably foolishly. Has the Bishop lost all sense of proportion? Why Holy Communion? Is it to worship God? Yes. God does not need our worship except as it relates to the service of our fellow men. This is as I understand Jesus' teaching. Do we make Holy Communion a means to that end? This it seems to me is God's plan. This is what Jesus did during the years of his sojourn on earth. "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these. . . ."

Holy Communion is wholly ceremonial. I was taught by my mother that Communion was a very solemn occasion. Celebrating Communion every two or three days, or daily, seems to me to lessen the solemnity. If Jesus were on earth today would he attend Communion every day? Yes, he would commune with the common people, and I do not believe he would ask if all had been confirmed. He would reach out to help the widows and the fatherless. I fancy he would say to many of us: "Ye pay tithes of mint and anise and cumin, but ye have neglected the weightier things of the law: deal justly, love mercy, help those who are in need; love thy neighbor."

Here is a light squib your readers might enjoy. It is our custom in the rectory to ask any guests who are seeing the New Year in with us to compose a ginger-ale toast. Then we vote on the best one. The nature of the toast is up to the individual. It may be serious or in a lighter vein. This was judged to be the best:

Here's to the men who harnessed the atom,
May they have the sense of the folks who begat 'em;
Either brithers all men shall become
Or else to oblivion they shall succumb.

The toast had to be composed impromptu with pencil and paper in hand in a given time of a few minutes. The winning toast this year happened to be composed by my husband, the rector.

Have we not had a surfeit of navy pictures on covers? Why are they appropriate anyway? The one of January 10 is an excellent photograph and if it were as catholic as religion would have some raison d'etre. That would mean that of your many such pictures some would come from England, some from Germany, some from France, some from the United States. Is there any doubt that Canadian and Jap and German fliers were caught in as fine poses as this and for like reasons? If you did attain this catholicity there would be only the one fundamental objection to your continued use of them: that such use publicizes the romance of war. There is a romance in war but it is bitterly overshadowed by the burdens so truly presented in Journey's End. Those burdens, breakdowns, tragedies, rarely are publicized, never by the army and navy. In these times when we are seeking, though desperately, for peace, would it not be Christian for a Church magazine to forego those things that throw a rosy glow about war and feed us with more essential truth?

ANSWER: It has been our aim in running these pictures to show the burdens, breakdowns and tragedies of war. They are not posed pictures but pictures taken in actual combat in the Pacific by Mr. Fons Iannelli, a top ranking photographer, who is thoroughly anti-war because he knows what war is first-hand. Of course there is no question whatever that all fighting-men, on whatever side of the conflict, went through the same harrowing experiences that these pictures, we believe, dramatize. And if Mr. Bennett will get for us as good pictures from British, German, Japanese or French sources we will be glad to use them. We were given ten of Mr. Iannelli's pictures, seven of which have appeared. The other three will follow. We add that these pictures were not secured from the Navy but directly from Mr. Iannelli.

J. FRED HAMBLIN
Rector of St. John's, Newark, N. J.

I have just read the new release in your January 10th issue concerning the Rev. Elmore McKee's recent sermon in St. George's Church on the return of the bodies of American dead from Europe to American soil.

I am sure there are others beside myself who take an opposite view to that of our good friend the Rector of St. George's, and who do not consider it "an example of organized paganism," nor "an affront to the graciousness of Christmas" to desire the return of the bodies of their loved ones to the soil of their native land. As I stated in an answer to Mr. McKee which I addressed to the New York Herald Tribune, a copy of which was furnished the Rector of St. George's "only those who have lost their sons in this horrible war can know the heart-ache which has come to bereaved parents." I do not for a moment subscribe to his theory that "this is an example of organized paganism," nor that it is sponsored by those who "seek profit" out of the return of these honored dead.

I think the same space should be given to this protest as the news release received in your issue of January 10th.

ANSWER: Facts are now being gathered on this matter which will be the basis of an editorial later.

Standard Revision of Bible Is Out February 11th

Witness Editor Frederick C. Grant Served On Commission of Distinguished Scholars

By W. B. Spofford

Chicago:—The Revised Standard version of the New Testament, on which the foremost Biblical scholars in the United States have been working for sixteen years, will be for sale in book stores on February 11th. The project was sponsored and financed by the International Council of Religious Education which is to present the first official copy to Harold E. Stassen at the annual meeting of the organization which is to be held next month in Columbus, Ohio. The former governor of Minnesota and navy commander is the president of the Council. The presentation will be made by Dean Luther A. Weigle of Yale Divinity School who is the chairman of the revision committee.

DR. GRANT

Two of the nine men who served on the committee are Episcopalians. One is our own WITNESS editor, Frederick C. Grant, and the other is W. Russell Bowie, formerly the rector of Grace Church and now a professor at Union Seminary. Others on the commission are Prof. Millar Burrows of Yale; Prof. Henry J. Cadbury of Harvard; Prof. Clarence T. Craig of Oberlin; Prof. Edgar J. Goodspeed of Chicago; Dean Weigle; Dr. Abdel Ross Wentz, the president of Lutheran Theological Seminary. Also serving until his death in 1944 was Prof. James Moffatt, also of the Union Seminary faculty.

The translation of the Old Testament will take about four years more, the revision committee has announced.

The committee for revision of the translation of the Scriptures was formed in 1930. It was authorized by the forty Protestant denominations that compose the International Council of Religious Education.

The committee was asked to prepare a version in which the archaic language and the "inaccuracies" of the King James version would be eliminated, but which would retain its simple, classic style. The committee has worked in two sections, one dealing with the Old Testament and the other with the New Testament.

The latter has held thirty-one meetings, covering 145 days. When one member had completed his initial version of a particular book in the New Testament, a typed copy of his draft was sent to each member of the section for study. At the next meeting of the committee the draft was discussed verse by verse. A new draft, prepared by the late Prof. James Moffatt of Union Theological Seminary, who also had made a translation of the Bible, then was mimeographed and distributed.

In August, 1943, a meeting was held at East Northfield, Mass., birthplace of Dwight L. Moody, evangelist, and the manuscript of the entire New Testament again underwent scrutiny. Then the revised manuscript was placed in the hands of a small editorial committee. This group prepared it for publication.

This is the first standard Protestant revision published since 1881. The American Standard version appeared in 1901. An entire new grammar of the New Testament Greek has been evolved by scholars since the publications of 1881 and 1901. Earlier scholars had followed the grammar of classical Greek, which anticipated New Testament days by about 300 years.

Greek had changed in these centuries, but the only literature available to earlier translators of the later period was the New Testament until fragments of Papyri more recently were found in ancient Egypt.

One feature of the revision will be that the familiar "Thee's," "Thou's" and "Thine's" will be missing except where God is addressed in prayer. "Jehovah" will be used where King James' version uses the word. Where this name is interpreted as "Lord" in the King James version it will be used likewise in the new revision.

In addition to the revision committee of nine there are an advisory board of forty-three men representing 35 of the larger Protestant denominations who assisted in the work. The representative of the Episcopal Church was the Rev. Cuthbert A. Simpson of the General Seminary faculty.

DR. BOWIE

On the same date that the New Testament is placed on sale a pamphlet containing articles by members of the committee dealing with various phases of their work will be placed on sale. The volume contains nine articles with Dr. Grant writing on The Greek Text of the New Testament and Dr. Bowie writing of The Use of the New Testament in Worship.

Both the New Testament and the pamphlet called Introduction are published by Thomas Nelson and Sons.

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION CONFERENCE

Philadelphia: — A conference on religious education opened at the Church House here on January 22 and will meet for five consecutive Tuesday evenings. The headliners are the Rev. Henry Smith Leiper of the World Council of Churches; Bishop Remington; Mr. Louis M. Washburn, of the diocesan committee on a Christian world order; Dr. William Draper Lewis, director of American Law Institute, and the Rev. O. Frederick Nolde of the commission on a just and durable peace of the Federal Council of Churches. The theme is "Christian on Four Fronts for Peace."

In addition to many leaders within the diocese who will lecture on various subjects, there will be a lecture on labor relations by the Rev. Harry F. Ward, formerly of the faculty of the Union Theological Seminary in New York. Also one of the features of the conference will be a course for the leaders of youth.

RELIEF COMES FIRST SAYS ARCHBISHOP

London (wireless to RNS): — An immediate task of the United Nations must be the relief of starving populations in war-affected countries, the Archbishop of Canterbury declared at a mass meeting in Albert Hall to welcome delegates to the United Nations General Assembly. The meeting pledged its dedication to peace aims by reciting in unison the preamble of the United Nations Charter.

"There is one task," the Archbishop said, "ready to the hands of the United Nations in which all can unite, and which divides none—the task of the common humanity which makes the world one. That is to relieve as fast as possible the famine and starvation that is bringing many millions in many nations to misery and death."

Speaking on behalf of the British churches, he urged the United Nations delegates "to relate their words to the realities of human hopes and fears," especially in view of the danger that the world may lose touch with actuality and be threatened with confusion instead of harmony.

CONVENTION OF OKLAHOMA

Oklahoma City: — All resident clergy and an unusually large number of lay delegates attended the convention of the diocese of Oklahoma meeting here January 16. A highlight was an address by Congressman Mike Monroney, an Episcopalian, who said that the Church had provided the United States with the sole power among the nations to provide the leadership necessary to attain a just peace, a cooperative economic arrangement and a wholesome social order.

Resolutions were adopted urging the state to provide psychiatric services for children; commended certain newspapers for publishing news of the praiseworthy accomplishments of minority racial and cultural groups; urging the General Convention to continue Forward in Service; accepting college work as a diocesan responsibility rather than solely that of a local congregation.

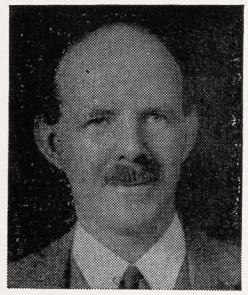
Bishop Casady, both in his convention address and the one before the Auxiliary, stressed the need for providing personal counselling services. He said that emotional tensions were so great these days that the Church has a unique opportunity and duty to provide these services. Later the convention established a department on personal counselling with the Rev. H. A. Guiley, rector at Enid, as chairman.

The convention also went on record as favoring a revision of the marriage canon and also urged that effective steps be taken to carry further the movement toward unity.

At the service in the evening various aspects of diocesan life were outlined; Dean John S. Willey on the functions of a cathedral; the Rev. Seth C. Edwards of the Redeemer, Oklahoma City, on the growth of Negro work; Judge W. Mills on the work of the diocesan laymen's committee.

Delegates elected to General Convention: Clergy: G. H. Quarterman of Ardmore; E. H. Eckel of Tulsa; P. R. Palmer of Muskogee; T. O. Moehle of Ponca City. Alternates: J. S. Ewing, Norman; A. V. Hock, Stillwater; J. A. Klein, Pawhuska, V. R. Hatfield, Ada. Laymen: J. B. McClelland Jr., Oklahoma City; C. W. Tomlinson, Ardmore; A. D. Cochran, Okmulgee; Judge C. M. Mills, Oklahoma City. Alternates: R. W. Greensdale, Tulsa; Col. T. D. Harris, Ponca City; L. C. Ritts, Tulsa; Frank McCoy, Pawhuska.

The Auxiliary, meeting at the same time, passed resolutions which were sent to President Truman and other federal officials, urging that adequate funds be made available to UNRRA; that price controls be continued indefinitely as one means of preventing inflation; urging the whole-hearted cooperation of the United States in the United Nations Organization.



CHURCH SCHOOL IS MOVED

New York—The National Council has received a cable telling that Mr. Robert A. Kemp, who has recently been working at the Union Middle School at Tsingchen, China, has now reached Wuchang, and that the Union School itself, with all its personnel and baggage, is now en route from Tsingchen to Wuchang.

Mr. Kemp's forty years in China have been attended with many adventures. He did relief work in the province of Kiangsu during the flood and famine of 1906-1907. He worked as an engineer on road construction in the north China famine of 1921. He managed the Boone relief camp during the Hupeh flood of 1931, and supervised construction for the Wuchang camps. He served as advisor on the refugee relief Hankow committee of the International Red Cross in 1938.

Mr. Kemp passed through the capture of Wuchang by revolutionaries in 1911, the forty day seige and final capture of Wuchang by the Communist armies in 1926, and the capture of Wuhan center by the Japanese armies in 1938. Now, at the end of World War II he returns to Wuchang to prepare for the resumption of the Middle School program there.

CHURCHMEN IN THE NEWS: Bishop Casady of Oklahoma leads a lively diocesan convention; Dean Zabriskie meets with fellow educators to discuss problems of seminaries; the Rev. Robert D. Gribbon proposes pooling of clergy salaries at meeting of General Seminary alumni

College Education Essential For the Professions

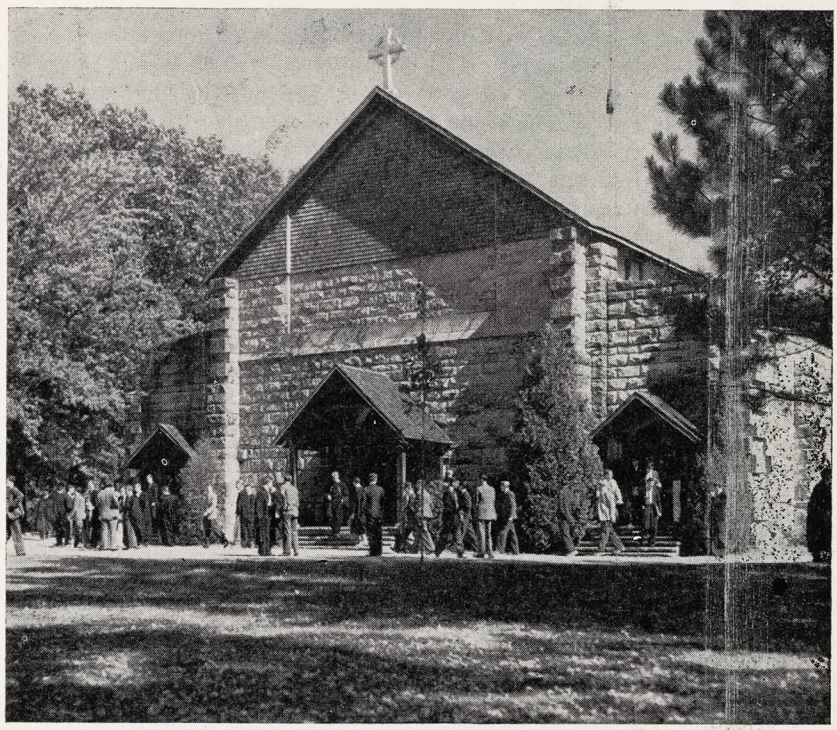
Vice-Chancellor of University of the South Also Declares That It Is an End in Itself

By Alexander Guerry
Vice-Chancellor of the University of the South

Sewanee, Tenn.:—A college education is essential preparation for the professions. Two, three or four years of college are necessary for admission to a professional school. Four years of college or the equivalent is required for study in a graduate school. The greatest asset a man who enters a professional or graduate school can have, next to his own character and intelligence, is a superior college training.

The greatest handicap will be an inadequate or mediocre college education. Failure or extreme difficulty in a professional or graduate school has come only too often from poor college preparation.

A college education is the finest sort of foundation for business or any occupation. The discipline of the mind, the capacity for logical reasoning, the capacity to draw correct conclusions and to make right decisions, the capacity for analysis and interpretations, the art of discrimination, insight, a sense of values, and a broad general knowledge, these are the fruits of a college education. And these qualities, in addition to a particular skill or special or specialized information, are the necessary foundation for the effective pursuit of an occupation or a business. Any person without a broad general knowledge and without certain capacities and ability, and with only a particular skill and specialized information, is limited in what he can and will accomplish in any field of endeavor. There is no doubt of that.



A college education is also an end in itself, the enrichment of the personality, the mind, and the character of the individual, whatever profession, business or occupation he may follow. The intellectual and spiritual growth of the individual is the goal of education and the goal of the individual for himself, especially in a democracy. The individual grows not only through his own experiences but through his knowledge of the experiences and aspirations of the human race and through his understanding of the history of man and his institutions and of the world in which man lives.

A person becomes endowed with the qualities for citizenship in a government of the people not only through his own experiences and ideas but through a knowledge far beyond his own experiences and opinions, and, thereby, through a deeper understanding of the content of democracy as well as the structure of democracy.

All this comes in a large part from study in the great fields of knowledge at the college level. Study in the great fields of knowledge is liberal education, liberal arts college education.

The University of the South is essentially a liberal arts college. Its curriculum is composed of courses and classes which comprise the general fields of learning, the great fields of knowledge.

The University of the South offers itself as the door of opportunity to the veterans who desire an excellent college education and who realize the importance and value of fine college training.

The chapel is the center of the religious life at the University of the South

INTERRACIAL SERVICE AT CATHEDRAL

New York:—An interchurch, interracial service is to be held on the afternoon of Feb. 10th at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, sponsored by the Interracial Fellowship of Greater New York in cooperation with the Federal Council of Churches and the Greater New York Federation of Churches. The sermon will be by the Rev. Howard Thurman, the dean of the chapel at Howard University. The Rev. Newton Chiang, Christian leader in China now doing special work at Yale Divinity School, will take part in the service, as will Bishop Charles K. Gilbert.

PRAYER FOR UNITY IN FRANCE

Paris (wireless to RNS):—Churches of all denominations took part in the annual Week of Prayer for Christian Unity which began January 18. The observance was started nearly twenty years ago by two Protestant pastors, but it is now marked by all Church groups. Each day during the Week, the liturgy was celebrated in the Eglise des Carmes, Roman Catholic Carmelite church, by the Eastern Rite Maronite, Melchite, Chaldean, Russian, Syrian, Ruthenian and Armenian Churches. Evening services were held, and on Sunday, January 20, a preacher stressed the need for unity among all Christians.

At the American Church on the Quai d'Orsay, Eastern Orthodox priests joined Anglican, Swedish, American and French Protestant pastors in ecumenical services at which Marc Boegner, president of the French Protestant Federation, preached. The choir of St. Serge's Orthodox Church assisted at the ceremonies.

THE MAN BEHIND THE BOMB

Mobile, Ala.: — "The key to our salvation today is not the atomic bomb but the man behind the bomb," were the challenging words of the Rev. William Marmion, rector of St. Mary's, Birmingham, in the main address at the annual meeting of the Auxiliary here January 16-17. He said that a "new man is needed for the new day. The small scale individual is the greatest obstacle to the realization of our dreams of world peace." The theme was reiterated by Mrs. Douglas Arant, also of Birmingham, in her address as diocesan devotional chairman. Mrs. Arant was recently appointed representative of the 4th province to the national board of the Auxiliary, the first Alabamian to hold the office. Bishop Carpenter spoke of various needs in the diocese, especially for student work.

BOSTON CLERGY PICKET

Boston:—Eleven ministers of various denominations, together with a number of lay people, marched in the picket line around the East Boston plant of General Electric on January 23. They carried such signs as "Support the fight for decent wages at G.E."; "Millions in Profits for G.E. but no increases in wages. Sounds goofy"; "G.E.'s motto: high prices, low wages; our motto: decent wages and low prices."

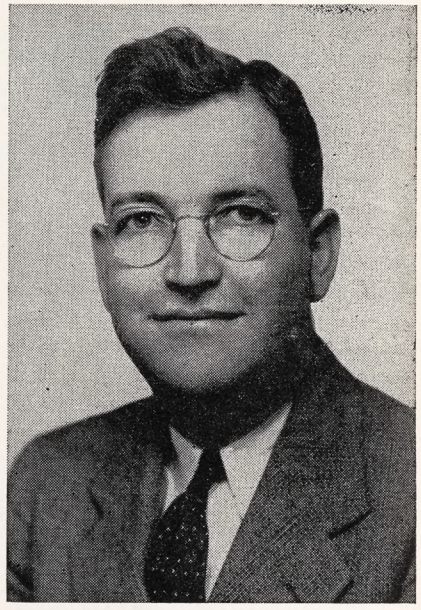
The following members of the Church League for Industrial Democracy took part in the demonstration: the Rev. Joseph F. Fletcher, professor at the Episcopal Theological School; the Rev. Robert Cook, a graduate student at ETS; the Rev. Warren M. McKenna, rector of St. John's, Roxbury; the Rev. David I. Hecht of the Oratory of St. Mary; the Rev. Hastings Smyth, also of the Oratory; the Rev. W. B. Spofford Jr., on the staff of the social service department of the diocese of Massachusetts, and also Mrs. Spofford, who is the secretary of the Boston chapter of the CLID.

Others in the picket line were the Rev. J. C. B. Murphy, Unitarian minister of Lawrence; the Rev. D. A. Wells, Methodist; Prof. John W. Brush of the Andover-Newton Theological School; G. Richard Kuch, associate director of Unitarian youth and the Rev. Stephen H. Fritchman, the editor of The Christian Register, Unitarian weekly.

These demonstrators have organized as the Workers Aid Appeal for the purpose of supporting the strikers with living necessities and moral backing.

WAR MEMORIAL IN WYOMING

Laramie, Wyo.:—The young people of Wyoming are raising funds for a war memorial. It will be a youth center for camp and conference located at the Harry Raymond Ranch which was recently presented to the district. They hope to raise $5000.



CHARGES PRESIDENT STOPS RELIEF

Chicago:—The Rev. Franklin C. Fry, president of the United Lutheran Church, in an address here on January 22 before 2,500 Lutherans, charged that President Truman had flatly refused to allow American Church organizations to ship clothing, food or medical supplies to any part of occupied Germany. He declared that the British government had, a month ago, informed the national Lutheran council that such shipments could be made. The speaker declared that he was "shocked" by the interview which he and Methodist Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam had with President Truman on the subject.

THE WITNESS immediately got in touch with Bishop Oxnam who stated that he got quite a different impression when he and Dr. Fry saw the President. He stated that Mr. Truman had listened to the statement about the great needs of Europeans with great sympathy and that he most assuredly had not refused to allow the shipment of relief supplies, though he was unable to set a definite date when shipments could be made. Bishop Oxnam went on to say that he thought it would help if individuals and churches wrote Mr. Truman urging that shipments be allowed at the earliest possible time because of the emergency of the situation. He also stressed that it is all the people of Europe that we must aid and not merely the people of Germany.

BISHOP DUN HEADS WELFARE SURVEY

Washington:—Bishop Angus Dun has been made chairman of a city-wide survey of family and child welfare investigating the need for private assistance for families and children. The survey is being directed by professional social workers but is being made by volunteers. Virtually every home in the District of Columbia is being visited.

The Rev. Cameron Hall, social service secretary of the Presbyterian Church, has accepted election to be the associate executive secretary of the industrial relations division of the Federal Council of Churches. He will take his new position on April 1

DINNER MEETINGS FOR VETERANS

Detroit:—Returned veterans from St. Mary's here held on January 16th what is hoped will be a series of dinner meetings at which matters of concern to them will be discussed. The 26 men who attended the initial meeting heard Ralph Watts, aviation reporter for a local paper, give facts and figures on the city airport.

Socony and the Church

ON A recent evening we sat at the radio listening to Information Please, one of our favorite programs. Mr. Kieran and Mr. Adams were at their best; the guest experts better than usual, and we were very much pleased with ourselves, along with a million other Americans no doubt, because we knew an answer that Mr. Kieran did not.

The program was as usual interrupted by a brief commercial. An energetic voice said, "Forty-five thousand Socony dealers all over the United States wish you good driving and they promise you the very best of service at the sign of the flying red horse." Then the sound effects . . . . cloppity, cloppity, cloppity. We thought of the Socony dealer at the end of our street . . . the one with the red headed assistant. Probably he too was sitting at home with his wife listening to his radio program. Quite an organization he works for . . . forty-five thousand dealers.

Since we too are members of a large group, the Episcopal Church, with its fellowship and organization, we began to ponder. What does the national organization of Socony do for our friend in the station at the end of the road. Three things: one, it supplies him with his gasoline, pumps, oil and grease. Two, it supplies him with directives on how to use these things; ways of promoting their local sale; convenient pamphlets and road maps for his customers. Three, and this was what concerned us at the moment, it provides him with national advertising in newspapers, magazines, bill boards, radio. The local dealer feels himself supported by a national campaign to make people Socony conscious. The little man is supported in his work so that apart from anything he may do the Socony products and their value are held before the people.

What is true of Socony is likewise true of the Roman Church with her efficient and encircling propaganda. The local priest or priests are provided with the tools they need: pamphlets, booklets, magazines, radio programs. He is sustained and supported by efficient propaganda that is piercing the country. Apart from anything the local parish may do people become conscious of, interested in, impressed by Rome. During the last Christmas season, to take the most recent example, the public eye was caught by the movie The Bells of St. Mary's; the Pope's article in a mass circulation weekly; the naming of cardinals; the food drive for Europe; the Pope's Christmas broadcast . . . in addition of course to all the local news. The little priest is not alone. He is supported psychologically and in his work by the great modern methods of communicating information.

But what is true of Socony and Rome is not true of the Episcopal Church or of Protestantism in general. We do not supply our clergy with the pamphlets and booklets that are needed. We need good and inexpensive tracts and pamphlets on baptism, marriage, confirmation, burial, the Episcopal Church, the Anglican Communion, so that no clergyman will have the slightest excuse for not using such aids to parish life.

Our clergy, rather than finding himself supported by the press, radio and screen, finds himself oppressed and stifled by the secular and Roman wall that is raised around him. He feels, not that apart from him a national organization is sustaining and encouraging him, but that everything in his community depends on his efforts alone. It is here that the great blind spot exists and here that much work must be done if the Church is to continue to grow.

We are aware that it is easy to write and difficult to do. Getting fair treatment in the press services; in the movies, the radio and the mass circulation magazines can only come as a result of united Protestant planning. But it must be done and is one of the things in which we should have leadership from national headquarters. We live in a centralized age and only central and united planning can be effective in it.

"QUOTES"

AMERICAN Protestantism must have something even more far-reaching than national cooperative research. It must now have joint planning and the beginnings of a nation-wide interdenominational strategy that will think in terms of regions, cultures, migrations of groups, congenial settings, appropriate ministries, historic resources, and all the other paraphernalia of ecumenical logistics. Locally the community presents new problems that cannot be solved by an unmodified denominationalism. If solved at all they must be solved either un-denominationally or interdenominationally. If we wish to preserve the values of historic Protestanism we must do together what cannot be done otherwise. These are days when we need not more but better Churches, nor hordes of new, poorly assimilated Church members coaxed to belong to a Church that expects little or nothing of them, but better Christians whose winsome living will automatically increase the membership of the Church."

High Pressure

THE pressure is on! During February, the effort to raise a Reconstruction and Advance Fund of more than eight million dollars will be in full swing. We mention this effort in terms of pressure because a friend of ours writes with some irritation, "When will a day go by without pressure from this fund?" Suppose for the fun of it, we admit that considerable pressure is being applied to the Church to raise this money. Then let's go a step further and analyze the pressure. Does it come from diocesan and National Council officials? In the imagination of many clergy such officials have created the pressure; in fact they seem to exist for no other reason than to irritate the clergy by concocting schemes and applying pressures. If this were so, life in the Church would be much more simple. We could refuse to cooperate, and go about our work in peace and joy without outside interference. The trouble with this is that it is pure imagination. Neither diocesan nor National Council officials invented this pressure. They, like us, are subjected to it. We might blame the House of Bishops. They are the ones who thought up the fund, set the tentative amount, and asked the Church to raise it. Baiting bishops is really great fun; almost as much fun as baiting diocesan and National Council officials. But if we aim to be honest we have to absolve the bishops, too! They along with the rest of us are subject to this pressure.

Some of it was pressure resulting from the war which wiped out a good part of the fabric of our missionary institutions. But most of it was a pressure of the nature of their office. Our bishops are missionaries,—administrative officials in an organism called the Church which by its very nature is a missionary organism. The primary responsibility of the Christian Church is the spread of Christ's kingdom. The real pressure therefore back of this fund is the pressure of a command Christ once gave to his Church. We might therefore answer our friend by saying that the pressure of this fund will abate as soon as the fund is raised. However this is poor consolation if one dislikes pressure, for as long as there is a single soul outside the fellowship of Christ, and as long as the relationships of men and nations rest on any foundation other than that of conformity to the will and purpose of God, the pressure will be upon us. The pressure will continue until Christ is king of kings and lord of lords.

Dramatic Arts and Religion

By
WILLIAM B. SPOFFORD, JR.

MARIE-LOUISE, the first of a series of Swiss importations, is a film that deals simply and humbly with the fate of Europe's children in the war. As an experiment, the National Council is making the film available for nothing to the churches of a number of dioceses as a part of the publicity campaign for the Reconstruction and Advance Fund. There is little doubt that this Swiss film is the best piece of argument for the Fund that has yet come my way and the National Council is to be heartily congratulated on sponsoring it.

The film is concerned with a young girl who has forgotten how to laugh. Marie-Louise received her first taste of modern warfare when her native village was bombed during the Nazi breakthrough in France in 1940. The horror of the moment, with her own house crumbling about her, makes an indelible impression upon her young and sensitive mind and nervous system. This first bombing is followed by others which turn her from a jolly child into a fear-haunted animal.

The main body of the picture deals with the rehabilitation of Marie-Louise in neutral Switzerland where a whole community — teachers, managers, mill-hands and secretaries — devote all of their effort to the salvation of the child victims of war. Even in that peaceful country, echoes of the conflict break in to destroy the slow and patient routine whereby mental and nervous health is restored. A peaceful airplane circling overhead gives Marie-Louise a nervous stroke; a telegram telling of her brother's death in an air-raid crushes her once again; the horror in the fact that she must return to war-torn France causes her to run away.

At the end, of course, Marie-Louise is again taught to laugh. In itself, I suppose, that is a minor thing. But so well is the script written and it is so expertly acted and filmed, that you can't help but feel that a major victory has been won. And who knows? Certainly a child's laugh was meant to be the end-result of five years of world struggle.

Marie-Louise may well be chosen as the outstanding foreign film of 1945. The National Council is to be applauded for making it available and it is to be hoped that other such ventures are forthcoming. And, don't forget, hundreds of thousands of children in this world have not yet been taught to laugh. We're the ones that have to teach them.

Trade, Peace and Religion

by Henry A. Wallace

The Secretary of Commerce

THE policy of the good neighbor is the practical application of the principles of religion. A revival and expansion of trade between good neighbors during the next few years will profoundly influence our progress toward the great goal of enduring peace. The relationship between international trade and world peace is not always understood, but it becomes clear if we think in terms of human needs and of the good life so greatly desired by all members of the human family.

World peace must be built on the firm foundation of political stability and economic security within each nation. In the war-ravaged countries of Europe and the East, the immediate and urgent problem is to provide people with the basic things they need—food, clothing, shelter—and with the means for reviving their agriculture, their industries, and the vast mechanisms of distribution. Then, and then only, will these countries be ready for political adjustments and stable governments and for friendly relations with other countries.

HENRY A. WALLACE

UNRRA and certain private organizations are trying to give immediate relief where needed to sustain life itself; permanent rehabilitation must be undertaken by the people themselves and by their governments. But the countries ravaged by the war cannot rehabilitate themselves without obtaining basic products from overseas and from each other. Whatever the form of payment—cash, credit, or barter — each country's most urgent shortages must be filled before it can hope to establish a stable economy. Food, clothing, household goods, construction materials, machinery and machine tools, raw materials and fuel—these and many other items are needed in great volume.

During the war all countries, those outside of the war zones as well as those in which the war was actually fought, found it hard to keep their industries going and to maintain their normal way of life, because many of their usual sources for raw materials and products were cut off. This experience and the present emergency, during which war-torn countries cannot provide for their own basic needs, have driven home the fact that the economic well-being of every nation is dependent on international trade. But the present great demand for materials and products, resulting from wartime destruction and interruption of normal trade, is exceptional only in its size and range. For, at all times, the countries of the world are dependent one on another, are members of one family.

In building the structure for the United Nations Organization, the governments represented at the San Francisco Conference recognized this interdependence in creating an Economic and Social Council. Provision is made through this body for collaboration of the nations in their many and varied peacetime activities in order to promote, as stated in the Charter, "the conditions of stability and well being which are necessary for peaceful and friendly relations among nations." We may expect fruitful results from the proposed International Trade Organization, one of the specialized instrumentalities to be set up under the Economic and Social Council.

During the next few years, the United States will be the principal country that can supply other countries with the products and materials they so urgently need. For a time, we shall doubtless have little difficulty in finding markets abroad for almost any goods that we can spare, and our exports will be much greater in volume than they were before the war. Fortunately, this situation will do much to ease some of our own reconversion problems, for in supplying these foreign markets we will provide jobs for millions of our own workers. Much of the demand from abroad will be for wheat, cotton, tobacco, fruit, lard and other staple agricultural products, and for railway equipment, trucks, tractors, industrial machinery and other products of our heavy industries, of which we have either surpluses on hand or potential productive capacity.

BUT we need to look ahead beyond this period of replenishment. Within a few years, the countries now eager to buy from us, that are indeed dependent on buying from us, will be approaching their own normal volume of production, and other countries will have reestablished their capacity for export. The financial reserves and the credits now being used to pay for importations from the United States will be largely depleted. Our foreign customers must somehow have sufficient dollars to pay for the American products they may wish to buy and we may wish to sell, and also to repay us for the goods we supplied on credit. Sound business procedure, our own long-term national interest, even our hopes for world peace demand that we plan now to make this situation possible.

Our great mistake during most of the period between World War I and World War II was that we did not see our foreign trade problem as a whole. We promoted the expansion of our exports, and for a time the lending of our surplus funds abroad. At the same time we unduly restricted imports by our tariff policy. Thus we closed the principal way in which foreign countries could repay us for exports and for our financial investments. We must plan better this time. We must keep ever in mind that international trade is a two-way road, and that in the long run we must buy from abroad through imports of goods and services at least as much as we sell through exports.

First, we need to find ways of widening the range and increasing the volume of foreign goods which we can import advantageously for our own industries and consumers and with a minimum dislocation of our own production. Secondly, we should encourage American travel in foreign lands. A billion dollars spent abroad by American tourists is just as effective in enabling foreign countries to pay for our exports as a billion dollars paid out by us to those countries for imports into the United States. Quite apart from this aspect of money spent abroad by American tourists, wider travel in other countries contributes toward better international understanding. Thirdly, we should look with favor upon the sound investment of an appreciable part of American savings in foreign loans and enterprises, for such investment will rebuild and develop the resources of other countries. Witness the long-term investments which the British made in the nineteenth century in opening up less developed countries, including the building of railroads and factories in the United States. It resulted in the greatest expansion of world trade and the most rapid rise in standards of living ever experienced.

Our Congress has taken many steps within recent months to meet the long-range needs of our own foreign trade and to discharge our present responsibility as the chief nation able to help other countries regain economic security.

The President has been given renewed authority to conclude trade agreements with foreign countries for the reciprocal reduction of tariffs and other international trade barriers. A sizable expansion in the loanable funds of our Export-Import Bank has been authorized, and arrangements are being concluded with various governments for credits to cover their large immediate purchases of American goods, insofar as they cannot at present make payments for these goods through imports. The two Bretton Woods Agreements have been ratified: for an International Monetary Fund to aid orderly adjustments of the foreign values of currencies and to tide over countries with temporary exchange difficulties, and for an International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the purpose of which is indicated by its name.

But this country cannot by itself set the pattern for commercial and financial relations between the nations of the world. This depends on the cooperation of many nations and on adjustments of diverse needs and interests. Unfortunately, many countries, faced with special problems and uncertainties in this postwar period, have less freedom than the United States in choosing the road ahead. Herein lies the difficulty in developing a coordinated and consistent program for international trade.

Unless present trends in many foreign countries are soon modified, world trade may be seriously curtailed after the replenishment period through import permit systems, exchange restrictions, trade-diverting preferences and discriminatory trading arrangements, and higher import duties.

In addition, government trading or state-directed trading, practiced by some countries, is likely to increase. Some of these current measures and trends may be temporary and precautionary. In the main, however, they are likely to become the controlling conditions of trade unless the United States takes courageous leadership in a program for expanding world trade on a liberal basis.

THE total volume of international trade is dependent upon economic activity in the chief industrial countries, especially in the United States. If we come through the reconversion period able to support close to full peacetime employment and a high and stable level of business operations, we will naturally be in a position to use large amounts of imported raw materials of many kinds and luxuries from a wide range of foreign sources. Imports to fill these large demands would increase the purchasing power of many countries and put an end to their fears of a possible slump in the markets and prices for their exports. As a result, severe restrictive controls on importations into these foreign countries would be eased automatically.

Thus it is clear that a prosperous America, utilizing its own human and material resources to the fullest extent, is the greatest single contribution we can make to the revival and expansion of international trade and to the prosperity of foreign countries.

Only concerted international action, however, can adequately handle certain situations that obstruct world trade. In the field of currency and finance, the Bretton Woods Agreements have already been worked out by joint international consultation. Parallel to these agreements, and recognized as essential to their effective operation, is a program for the reduction of trade barriers and other restrictive practices by as large a number of nations as possible. Such a program must be developed without delay, so that each country's domestic program to provide for high employment may support rather than frustrate economic advancement in other countries.

Before such a far-reaching program can be put before the family of nations with much likelihood of success, there must be substantial agreement as to general objectives among the principal trading countries. In this connection, the recent economic discussions at Washington between officials of the United States and the United Kingdom, the two leading commercial nations, were of the utmost importance, since they dealt with commercial policy problems as well as with the settlement of our Lend-Lease accounts and a loan to the United Kingdom. Both countries were in substantial accord on our own long-range trade objectives and on the general approach to an international program of economic reconstruction. But the United Kingdom, unlike the United States, is not free to work out such a program until more immediate problems are solved; namely, how to finance imports needed during the replenishment period, and how to deal with war-born foreign debts, commonly referred to as "the blocked sterling balances."

It may be necessary for us to help some foreign countries to solve such specific problems so that they may then be free to support a broad international program. The British situation is a case in point. Our producers and exporters have been clamoring for the United Kingdom and other British countries to give up their tariff preferences with the Empire and their present systems of exchange control, which are discriminatory and restrictive for American trade. If substantial progress is to be made toward these objectives, and if the United Kingdom is to join with us in urging acceptance of the broad proposals for expansion of world trade and employment, financial backing must be provided.

Such backing is given in the proposal now under consideration to extend to the United Kingdom a credit of $3,750,000,000 at moderate rates, repayable over a long term of years. Without such help the British feel that they will be forced further to tighten the sterling bloc and the Empire preferential system, continue wartime bulk trading and exchange restrictions, and enter into exclusively bilateral arrangements with outside countries that are largely dependent on the British market. If such restrictive action is taken, no foreign country would be more injured than the United States. Not only would our exports decline, but the general market for wheat, cotton, tobacco, and other commodities for which we have surplus production capacity would be depressed.

Although the British situation is now prominent, owing to consideration of the proposed credit, many of our other Allies, chief among them the U.S.S.R. and China, also need financial assistance in reestablishing their economies. In addition, the Latin American countries and others not directly affected by the war are anxious to develop their natural and industrial productive possibilities, and they look mainly to the United States for financial credits.

Assistance to the countries of Europe and Asia in recovering from the destruction of the war, and to other countries in the general development of their resources, will go far in restoring and expanding international trade, and will promote our own domestic economy and that of the other countries. But the effect of such assistance is even more significant and far-reaching. We shall be making an investment in the well-being of all peoples. Such well-being is essential for political stability and for the maintenance of world peace.

These matters of economics and of trade, of industrial activity and reconstruction are more closely related to the ideals of religion than has often been appreciated. Loans and expanded trade agreements will come more rapidly and with less difficulty if the rank and file American who really wants peace studies these proposals. Ministers and Church people can help greatly by having a discussion of these practical economic programs on the agenda of their church forums. This kind of hard civilian thinking is as important now as it was during the actual days of the war. Religion and economics can be strong partners in building peace.

For Church School Teachers

By

WILLIAM GRIME

SOME of you who are very young teachers tell me that when you have to teach children about prayer you find you haven't a definite method of praying yourself. You report hearing sermons on the general subject of prayer but you would like to know how to pray so you may teach others likewise. Try this: it happens to be my own method of praying in private and before the altar. Kneel down reverently and quieten your mind. If you are going to spend five or ten minutes in prayer spend at least one in letting the sediment in your soul settle.

First think of God. Recall your favorite picture of Jesus Christ, for he is the unveiling of God the father in human form. Don't toss this out as "just imagination" for imagination has its high uses just as reason does. A saintly scholar once called him "the human face of God" for God is like Christ in spirit, affection, purpose and power. Faithfulness in this practice will lead you to find, especially in the holy communion, that that picture can come alive and make you more keenly aware of the reality of him who under the forms of bread and wine draws near to your side to listen to your prayers with the deepest possible desire to share his life and love with you.

a. Say something like this — we call it an act of praise: "Praise be to thee, O Christ" or "O Christ who didst come into the home of Mary and Martha, I thank thee thou hast come here to be with me."

b. Sometimes I commence my prayers by singing (within) a hymn such as:
Jesus, the very thought of thee
With sweetness fills the breast,
But sweeter far thy face to see,
And in thy presence rest.

Here tell him you love him, for except you keep on becoming like little children in trust you cannot enter into the more mature experiences of divine fellowship.

Next think of others. The children in your class, friends, parents, the needs of the Church and the world, unemployed, economic injustice, the frightened, the faithful, etc. Then I say the Lord's Prayer and some collects in the Prayer Book that fit into these needs and follow this with quiet for a moment to see what suggestions for social living arise in my mind.

Last of all think of yourself — yourself always last — a long way last.

a. You need penitence and forgiveness. Ask for the latter and claim it. Don't be satisfied just to believe it. Claim it and listen to him say: "Go in peace my child and sin no more."

b. You need more fighting spirit — more determination not simply to be a good, but a devoted friend of his.

c. End your prayer with another thanksgiving like "Glory be to Thee, O Lord." Don't forget Jesus did this. Listen. "Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me."

Still some of you may say: I have done this yet I don't feel when I pray that I receive extra help. That may be quite true. Our feelings do not always give us positive assurance in this matter. You will best find you have received extra strength from God when you take what you have received in faith and begin to apply it to some specific endeavor.

Now of course you won't follow this outline slavishly. These are just tested suggestions worth trying.

Home Missions Leaders Plan For the Postwar Era

A Greatly Increased Budget Was Adopted By Agency Representing Mission Boards

Edited by Sara Dill

Buck Hill Falls, Pa.:—Challenged by their leaders to accept the responsibility of more effectively working together on the missionary task in the United States and its possessions during the postwar era, nearly 200 representatives of 40 home missions boards and societies planned cooperative programs for needy peoples, migrant populations and minority groups at the annual meeting of the Home Missions Council held here, January 6-9.

"However much the Church in general may lag in the matter of greater unity, the missionary agencies must go ahead together," declared the Rev. Mark A. Dawber of New York, executive secretary of the Council, in his annual report. "If this is now one world then there is one missionary task, home and foreign. We are now obligated to give a better and greater demonstration of the Church changing the lives of people on the American continent if the Church is to be taken seriously in other lands."

In describing the implications of the home missions task in the atomic era, Dawber stated that the Church must help humanity achieve the better things of life by lifting their burdens in the change from a world of scarcity to a world of plenty.

The delegates of 23 Protestant denominations agreed to allocate $222,726 for interdenominational projects during the year, in adopting the 1946 budget of $326,092 for the Council. The new budget represents an increase of more than $87,000 over the 1945 budget. It includes $45,810 for the general operating expenses of the Council, $25,000 for the anniversary migrant work fund for the purchase and maintenance of a fleet of mobile units, $20,000 for a joint program of public relations for home and foreign missions, and $17,555 for the interdenominational bureau of architecture.

A new project for the training of Negro ministers in the cities will be started this year, probably in Indianapolis, Ind.; San Francisco, Cal., and Brooklyn, N. Y., with a budget allocation of $15,000. Emphasis in the program, which will be administered by the committee on city and bilingual work, will be on in-service training for Negro pastors.

Rapid expansion in the interdenominational program of religious and social ministry for agricultural migrants during the past two years, and the increasing activity of state committees, has resulted in the adoption by the committee on migrant work of a new financial policy, it was reported by Miss Edith E. Lowry, executive secretary of the Council. Under the new plan, state committees will be responsible for salaries and expenses of the seasonal migrant staff workers, while the national committee will continue to raise the budget for the national staff, composed of year-round workers.

Adoption of housing standards for agricultural migrants, similar to the code now in effect in New Jersey, will be urged upon the legislatures of other states where migrant labor is used extensively by members of the committee on migrant work and state and local committees. Local church ministers and lay leaders also are urged to take the lead in efforts to improve the attitudes of people in their communities toward migrant laborers.

The Indian committee made plans to expand religious work among the American Indians in New Mexico, Arizona and Dakotas through additional workers. Many interdenominational and denominational projects now are serving the Indians who have left the reservations to work in the cities.

Churches were urged by the Council, in adopting recommendations of the committee on the Christian approach to the Jews, "to establish friendly contacts" with Jewish neighbors and "seek to bring them within the scope of their ministry." An expansion of this Christian ministry is needed now, "in view of continued immigration of Jewish refugees into the United States," the recommendation added.

In view of the fact that Protestant churches are planning to spend $600,000,000 for new buildings, the church building committee reported to the Council that it is determining upon a usable "measuring unit" for a satisfactory church building loan. An effort is being made to induce loaning agencies to consider churches as good risks in new building programs. On the other hand, the committee also is urging "wise, long-range planning" in building programs, in order to avoid "the follies of our yesterdays."

Bishop's Anniversary

Buffalo:—The anniversary of the consecration of Bishop Davis as bishop of Western New York was observed on January 23, the exact date of his consecration. There was a clergy conference on diocesan affairs after which the Bishop entertained the clergy at a dinner in the diocesan house.

Theological Education

Washington:—A three day meeting of the joint commission on theological education met at the College of Preachers to discuss a variety of subjects. Probably the most important was a revision of the syllabus on theological education, and proposals for a revision of the canons on which it is based. However no announcement is yet ready on a proposed canon. Other matters discussed were statistical reports submitted by the seminaries; the DuBose School in Tennessee, which is now closed; the needs of the Bishop Payne Divinity School; present life in the seminaries; their problems for the postwar era; scarcity of properly trained teachers; and that perennial, "have we too many seminaries?"

★ We have the names of a considerable number of men available for positions. Likewise we have a list of positions that are seeking men—one just came in for instance for an assistant in a midwest parish that will pay from $3,000 to $4,000 depending on experience, age, etc. Our procedure is as follows: twice each month we send to men seeking positions the list of rectorships and assistant positions, with the name in each case of the proper person to write. Then we send to the parishes, or to rectors seeking assistants, the names of men seeking positions. It is impossible for us, at least at this stage of the game, to give individual attention to the many inquiries that come in. We will however, unless we become swamped, send these mimeographed reports to those who are genuinely interested in seeking a man for a position or vice versa. We do ask however that no one ask for these reports merely to satisfy their curiosity. Address letters to Get-Together: THE WITNESS, 135 Liberty Street, New York 6, N. Y. and enclose a self-addressed envelope please.

Attending: Bishop Augus Dun, chairman; Dean Taylor of ETS; Dean Fosbroke of General; Dean Roach of Bexley; Dean Zabriskie of Virginia; Dean Shires of the Pacific; Dean Rose of Berkeley and the Rev. Messrs. V. F. Pottle, Edgar C. Young, Bayard H. Jones and T. O. Wedel.

California Convention

San Francisco:—Bishop Arthur B. Kinsolving 2nd of Arizona was the headliner at the convention of California, held at Grace Cathedral January 28th-30th. He spoke on missionary service in the domestic field and also on the Church world-wide mission. Others to address the convention, besides Bishop Block, were Miss Katherine Grammer and the Rev. Charles Whiston on Church work as a vocation; Mrs. Eleanor Batte on women's work in the Church; the Rev. Karl Markgraf on Trinity Center in Oakland and St. Clara Elizabeth on St. Dorothy's Rest, a diocesan institution.

Support FEPC

*Bangor, Me.*s—A permanent Fair Employment Practices Committee was urged by the Maine council of churches at its annual meeting here last week. The council also went on record as opposed to compulsory military training in peace and the "discriminatory poll tax laws."

Convention Delegates

Grand Rapids, Mich.: — The following were elected delegates to the General Convention by the diocese of Western Michigan: Clergy: Donald V. Carey and H. Ralph Higgins of Grand Rapids; W. A. Simms of Battle Creek; W. C. Warner of Holland. Alternates: J. E. Allen of Saugatuck; A. G. Fowkes of Kalamazoo; Robert K. Giffin of Sturgis; D. M. Gury of Hastings. Laymen: Bernard B. Fallon and Norman A. Lilly of Grand Rapids; Charles R. Sligh Jr. of Holland; Chester C. Wells of Manistee. Alternates: Lee M. Holton of Kalamazoo; Otto P. Kramer of Holland; James Macgregor of Grand Rapids; James Stearns of Grand Haven.

Missionary Giving

Indianapolis, Ind.: — The diocese of Indianapolis, which five years ago gave $3,000 annually to missions has informed the National Council that it will give $8,000 this year. The diocese also is aiming at a goal of $30,000 for the Reconstruction and Advance Fund.

Study West Indies

London (wireless to RNS):—The Archbishop of Canterbury has named a five-man commission to confer with representatives of the Anglican Church in the West Indies on matters concerning its future welfare. Composed of three clergymen and two laymen, the commission will cooperate with a similar group representing the Episcopal Church in the United States. It was announced that 60,000 pounds have been raised to date toward a proposed minimum fund of 100,000 pounds for Anglican Church needs in the West Indies.

Unity in England

London (wireless to RNS):—Progress toward organic union of the Presbyterian Church of England and the Congregational Churches of England and Wales was reported following a second session at Cambridge of the joint conference set up by the Churches last year to discuss possibilities of union. It was announced that another session will be held in April. The meeting issued a statement stressing that the proposed scheme is not intended so much to embody a combination or dovetailing of existing Presbyterian and Congregational methods of government as to provide a new Church organization. The statement added that although the new organization will differ in some respects from those of both Churches, it will not do violence to the convictions of either denomination.

The conference said it hopes shortly to publish a comparative factual statement on some ten actual or projected unions involving Presbyterian and Congregational Churches, which show a general similarity in the solution of questions of doctrine, polity, and organization which have proved acceptable to both.

Discussions at the meeting indicated that acceptance of credal statements or confessions will not prove an insuperable barrier to union, but it was stated that further consideration will have to be given to the uses to be made of the creeds by the united Church.

Support for UNO

New York (RNS): — Prompt adherence of the United States to the educational, scientific and cultural organization of UNO is urged by the executive committee of the Federal Council of Churches in a message to the state department. The message is also to be sent to Congressional leaders. Terming the cultural group a step in an approach to world cooperation, the committee said that the "political instrumentalities for the maintenance of security and peace must be undergirded and supplemented by non-political forces that are related through intellectual, cultural and spiritual interchanges among the nations of the earth."

Against Union

Presbyterian Churches was opposed by Bishop Whittemore in his address before the convention of the diocese of Western Michigan last week. "We should not have a shot-gun wedding," he declared and then expressed the hope that "the whole project will be dropped." He was critical of national Church leadership on the matter and stated that the House of Bishops "has never had an opportunity to discuss this matter in free and open debate. With the best intentions in the world this affair has been badly stage-managed and is riding for a fall."

Indonesia

San Francisco: — Intercession by President Truman to stop the conflict in Indonesia was urged by the board of directors of the local council of churches of which the Rev. John Leffler, rector of St. Luke's is president. The statement declared: "We request the President of the United States to use his good offices with Great Britain to bring to an immediate end this slaughter of people whose dependency upon the Netherlands' government for 300 years has been so fruitless for them."

Millions for Relief

New York (RNS):—The Lutheran world council is to raise ten million dollars for the relief of the peoples of Europe. The first of 500 mass meetings was held last week in Chicago at which the Rev. Ralph H. Long and the Rev. Franklin C. Fry, both recently returned from Europe, stressed the need for immediate action to alleviate the suffering and distress there.

Citizenship Sunday

Montreal (RNS):—This city's English-speaking Christian population, both Protestant and Roman Catholic, celebrated January 13 as citizenship Sunday, sponsored by the Christian Social Order. Challenging all "to recognize and fulfill the obligations and duties of their Christian citizenship" the statement urged the application of Christian principles of living "not only in personal matters but in everyday affairs of the life of the city."

Clergy Placement Discussed

New York: — A provocate panel discussion on clergy placement was a feature of the mid-winder reunion of the alumni of the General Theological Seminary on January 16th. The subject was presented in brief addresses by four clergymen covering the urban, rural, college worker, and returned serviceman point of view, under the chairmanship of the Rev. Albert A. Chambers, rector of St. Peter's, Auburn, New York. For rural work the Ven. Charles B. Persell, archdeacon of Rochester, spoke urging that rural communities which have gone modern in such matters as refrigerators, radios, and cars should pay clergy salaries in line with present-day prices. The Rev. Otis R. Rice, acting Chaplain of Columbia University, pointed out the increasing opportunities for chaplains in colleges, hospitals, and the veterans' administration. The Rev. Godfrey W. J. Hartzel, recently of the navy, commented on the helpfulness of refresher courses for returning military chaplains and the difficulty of readjusting from army income to small Parish stipends. The Rev. Robert B. Gribbon, rector of the Church of the Holy Cross, Plainfield, N. J., speaking for urban churches, urged a realistic placement system for the whole Church with the possible adoption of some scheme for pooling all clergymen's income thus equalizing in a fair way (allowing for experience and size of family) the average income of the clergy. A spirited discussion from the floor followed.

Race Relations

New York: — Churches are asked to take the lead in combatting race discrimination by the Federal Council of Churches in a statement which is asked to be read in churches on Race Relations Sunday, February 10. The message calls upon churches specifically to open membership to all races, to support efforts against discrimination in employment, education, housing and recreation.

Center in Jerusalem

London (wireless to RNS):—The British Royal Air Force has opened a leadership center in Jerusalem for Anglican personnel in former premises of the Church of England missionary society. A similar center has also been established for servicemen belonging to the Free Churches. The centers will be open both to members of the RAF and its women's auxiliary. In addition to offering general leadership courses, the centers will conduct retreats, and hold classes for servicemen who intend to enter the ministry. They will also provide refresher courses for chaplains.

Westminster Abbey

London (wireless to RNS):—The first lists of civilian war dead have been placed in Westminster Abbey in a memorial shrine designed by Sir Charles Peers, surveyor to the abbey. The lists record particulars of nearly 60,000 civilians killed by enemy action in the United Kingdom. Names typewritten in four volumes will be inscribed on printed or engrossed lists when the records are completed. One volume, over which a light is kept burning, lies open in the shrine, and a page is turned over each day.

The Best Cure

London (RNS):—Religion is the best cure for neurotic people in this nerve-wracked world," Bishop H. A. Wilson told the annual conference of the Industrial Christian Fellowship. "I do not believe it is an accident, when so many people have lost their grip on spiritual reality, that they have also gone to pieces as far as nerves are concerned."

Hits Communists

Rome (wireless to RNS):—Alfred Ildefonso Cardinal Schuster, Archbishop of Milan, replied here to Communist charges that a recent pastoral letter by the bishops of Lombardy has created political unrest by condemning Communists. Writing in the Milan Osservatore, Cardinal Schuster asserted that the bishops' letter was not an attack on Communists, but merely a reminder to Catholics that the Communist attitude toward religion has several times been condemned by the Popes. "It is not possible to follow Christ and Marx at the same time," Cardinal Schuster declared. "If Italians try to make a compromise between Christ and Marx, the result will be to betray Christ, religion, and the Italian people."

Intolerance

Geneva (wireless to RNS):—Intolerance is still being shown to Protestants in Italy despite promulgation of religious freedom by the Allies, according to a dispatch from Rome to the International Christian Press with headquarters here. The report charges that although the status of the Roman Church was clearly defined in the Vatican-Italy concordat, the question of Church-state relations as it affects the Protestant Churches has not been clarified by Italain authorities. "Such urgent questions as the reinstatement of pastors who were dismissed years ago on the ground of resistance to Fascist political activity, and the reopening of places of worship, have been held in suspense without any valid reason."

Laymen's Program

Montgomery, Ala.: (RNS):—Baptist laymen of Alabama, at a recent meeting, issued the following program for their Church for 1946: 1, Aid to veterans in returning to school and in re-establishing their homes, securing jobs. 2, Independent laymen's surveys designed to assist the local pastor in fashioning a church program related to local needs. 3, Increasing study and action on juvenile delinquency. 4, Massing Christian forces to help Americans become world citizens and forestall another world war.

Novel Experiment

San Sebastian, Puerto Rico (RNS):—A novel experiment in which Christian youth will have the opportunity to give several years of service to the people of Puerto Rico is to be tried out at the El Guacio rural rehabilitation project here. Supported by the board of national missions of the Presbyterian Church, the project is designed to help solve the economic, spiritual, and health problems of the local population.

The plan calls for the building of such facilities as a community center, crafts center, and a clinic. It is expected to take from five to ten years. This year the project will need 12 workers — a doctor, three construction men, a laboratory technician, a farmer, a cook and laundryman, a boys' group worker, a girls' group worker, a religious educator, a pastor, and a business manager. Five youths already have volunteered for the service. Future plans call for 18 workers in 1947 and 24 in 1948.

Specific aims of the project are to introduce new techniques in agriculture, open up new channels for the distribution of local products and

Another to Moscow

Prague (wireless to RNS): — The Czechoslovak Orthodox Church has been transferred to the jurisdiction of the Russian Orthodox Church, it was announced here. Czech Orthodox have hitherto been subject to control by the Serbian Orthodox Church. The announcement said that the Orthodox bishopric of Prague, which is vacant at present, will be raised to arch-episcopal rank, and that the new incumbent when appointed, will receive the title of Patriarchal Exarch.

Evangelistic Drive

London (wireless to RNS): — British Protestant leaders have appealed to churches to sponsor a nationwide evangelistic campaign based on the theme that world peace must depend upon recognition of Christian values rather than upon a United Nations organization. The appeal, adopted at a three-day conference in Cambridge sponsored by the British Council of Churches, called upon churches of all denominations to unite in warning the people that "there is no such thing as security based on material possessions or upon organization alone."

"The message of the atomic bomb," the plea stated, "is that no society, no country, is safe unless it can look for its security to those human, personal relationships of friendship and respect for the immortal soul of man. It is not enough for the nations to agree to lock up the atom bomb and 'give the key to father.' Somebody will certainly steal the key or make another bomb in the back garden."

The religious leaders charged that the churches have been identified with "a dying era" and that they have not given the right leadership for the future. It was urged that in the new evangelistic movement not only should the churches work together, but "laymen should be the new evangelists."

Although stressing that the United Nations Organization must have the fullest support of the churches, the leaders warned that "no one should be deceived that this organization will prove the last word in security, which depends ultimately on Christian values."

Seeks Fund

Roanoke, Va.: — The executive board of the diocese of Southwestern Virginia, meeting here January 18, fixed a minimum of $48,000 as the goal of the diocese for the Reconstruction and Advance Fund. Noting the relation of this sum to the total amount of the diocesan expense assessments for the year, the board is urging each congregation to assume an objective of at least three and a third times the amount of its diocesan assessment.

Auto Accident

Roanoke, Va.:—The Rev. Charles O. Thompson, driving to his new parish at Summerville, S. C., from his former charge at Bluefield, Va., had a collision with a bus. Mrs. Thompson and their child escaped injury but Mr. Thompson was rather badly hurt and had to be taken to a hospital in Wytheville. It is hoped however that he will soon be fully recovered.

Church Woman Honored

New Haven: — Mrs. Albert S. Cook, who died recently, is to have a memorial in her honor at St. Paul's where she was a leader for many years. She was particularly active as a leader of the Girls' Friendly, now raising the money which will be used to establish a scholarship for some worthy girl each year at a Church summer conference. Mrs. Cook was a member of the vestry of the parish for about fifteen years.

Apostates on List

Tokyo (RNS): — Christians in Japan find it interesting that on the list of Japanese war criminals there is not one Christian "in good standing," although there are five so far who have dabbed in the faith and are now considered apostates. On the list is Naoki Hoshino, black-sheep son of a Christian pastor and a brother of Miss Aiko Hoshino, president of a Christian college in Tokyo. Hoshino got into jail for his years as a Tojo secretary and his experience as a Japanese empire-builder in Manchuria. He was chief cabinet secretary for Prime Minister Hideki Tojo from 1941 to 1944. Hoshino's father was the late Rev. Kota Hoshino.

Yosuke Matsuoka, foreign minister in 1940-41, is another of the war criminals who, Christians point out here, was brought up as a baptized Christian but wandered far from the fold in his later years. It was Matsuoka who led Japan into the tripartite Axis pact and turned rabidly anti-American, despite the fact that he was brought up in Portland and was graduated from the University of Oregon.

Shozo Murata, also on the Christian inactive list, took the job as Japanese ambassador to an "independent" Philippines and for that was placed on the list of criminals to be tried. Murata was once active in the Kobe student YMCA., president of the Japan Rotary Club, and was president of the Osaka Shosen Kaisha, shipping company.

Iichiro Tokutomi, who turned out to be one of Japan's prize journalistic propagandists during the war, was once a student at the Christian Doshisha University in Kyoto and was baptized. When Joseph Niishima, veteran president of Doshisha, died, Tokutomi turned back his certificate of baptism. He became president of the Great Japan press association. Fifth of the renegade Christians on the list of criminals is Nobutake Shioten, Japan's chief anti-Semite.

End Segregation

Buck Hill Falls, Pa.:—Integration of people of Japanese descent into the membership of non-Japanese congregations was urged in a set of principles adopted at the closing session of the annual meeting of the Home Missions Council. Adopted by the 200 delegates for reference to the executive committee, the council's statement recommended that "separate Japanese churches be organized only in very exceptional cases, and that they be organized on an inter-denominational basis." The statement also urged that pastors of Japanese ancestry be given positions in churches not exclusively related to the serving of Japanese.

E. B. VINCENT
Layman of New York City

The article by the Rev. Herbert W. Prince on Competition or Cooperation (WITNESS, Jan. 10) should be made into a tract and distributed as a part of the Reconstruction and Advance Fund drive. I have talked with a good number of laymen and I have yet to find one who does not agree that some way should be found to pool the resources of Protestant Churches in order that first rate work would be done in the foreign mission field. It is my conviction that if this could be done that the challenge would be so appealing that not ten million but twice that sum would be raised by our Church, and I dare say by other Churches as well.

GRIFFIN C. CALLAHAN
Rector at Ronceverte, W. Va.

The appeal for united re-building in the mission field (Talking it Over, Jan. 17) should be acted upon without debate! How can we preach and pray for unity between people in matters of international cooperation, in the field of management and labor, of in family quarrels if the Church, Christ's body, is dismembered. If there be any good to be found in war at all, I feel that it would be here in this matter: We have a clean slate and a fresh chance to build together; an opportunity that we cannot have so easily in our own land.

In our small towns in my field we often discuss in our ministerial meetings what a glorious job could be done if we were less divided in leadership and in our use of local financial support. Why should we extend unnecessary divisions into the new fields of Christianity, unless it be for the sake of pride and tradition? Most laymen I know would be happy to give more toward building inter-Church projects, such as hospitals, churches and schools, in the mission field, than they will toward re-building their own. Here in Ronceverte, we have an inter-Church group of men from six denominations who meet monthly and their interest and enthusiasm is worth relating. I hope later to have more news from them, and they will have this article before them at their February meeting, I promise you.

MICHAEL FITZGERALD
Roman Catholic Layman of New York

I was shocked at the statement in Mr. McMichael's article (WITNESS Jan. 17) that a widely used Catholic New Testament states that "The Jews are the synagogue of Satan. The true synagogue is the Christian Church." It is a false statement. There is no such Catholic New Testament and I defy you to name it. You do a great harm and injustice by printing such a statement.

ANSWER: The book referred to is The New Testament of Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, edited by Catholic scholars under the patronage of the Episcopal commission of the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine, published by St. Anthony's Guild Press, Paterson, N. J. in 1941. On page 701 there is a footnote in reference to verse nine, chapter two, of the Book of Revelation as follows: "The Jews are the synagogue of Satan. The true synagogue is the Christian Church."

New Testament scholars are not agreed as to the meaning of Revelation 2:9 but it is thought that the writer was referring to those who claimed to be Jews but were in fact Gnostics. Scholars are agreed however that there is no anti-semitic implication.

JOSEPH F. FLETCHER
Prof. at Episcopal Theological School

We should not be surprised if we find that a textbook on Christian morals which regards slavery as theoretically justifiable also indulges in anti-semitism. In the second volume of Moral and Pastoral Theology (Sheed and Ward, 1943) by the English Jesuit scholar Henry Davis, the theoretical justification of slavery is found on pages 269-270.

The anti-semitism occurs in a passage on page 259: ". . . . God wishing to recall the Jewish people—naturally prone to cruelty—to a sense of pity forbade certain appearances of cruelty in respect of dumb animals."

Davis refers to Thomas Aquinas as authority for his discussion of man's proper treatment of dumb beasts. As a matter of fact, Aquinas in the Summa Theologica, did say that the Jewish people "were prone to cruelty" but even if his meaning was that cruelty was still a culture trait of the Jews as late as the thirteenth century there is no reason for Davis to perpetuate such a pre-scientific, unanthropological notion.

It is at least doubtful that Aquinas meant anything more than that the primitive Israelites (like most early peoples) were indifferent to the feelings of dumb brutes. It should be noted that a relevant passage (not cited by Davis) in Aquinas' Summa Contra Gentiles, has no hint of such a prejudice. In any case Davis has definitely twisted Aquinas' treatment by referring to the Jews as "naturally prone to cruelty."

This textbook is a recent and popular one in Roman Catholic seminaries, has gone into at least four editions, and enjoys the usual nihil obstat and imprimatur.

Bishop Manning Hits Revision Of the Prayer Book

Tributes Paid to Him at the Annual Dinner Of the Church Club of New York at Waldorf

By W. B. Spofford

New York: — Tributes were paid to Bishop William T. Manning of New York at the dinner of the Church Club on January 29th at the Waldorf-Astoria. While the events do not come until May, this annual dinner was the occasion for the celebration of Bishop Manning's eightieth birthday, the fifty-fifth anniversary of his ordination to the priesthood and the twenty-fifth anniversary of his consecration.

BISHOP MANNING

Bishop Henry K. Sherrill of Massachusetts expressed his gratitude to Bishop Manning and the clergy and lay people of New York for the fine support given to the army and navy commission of which he is chairman. He stated that in the past two years he had travelled 40,000 miles, mostly by plane, and that since the organization of the commission over a million and a half dollars had been raised to carry on the work. Over a million Prayer Books have been distributed by the commission to men in the armed forces. He also stressed the interesting fact that in raising this sum of money that there has been not more than ten gifts of $1,000 or more — that the vast sum had been raised through the small contributions of many people.

He declared that the Episcopal Church has about 500 men serving as chaplains and he paid a great tribute to them for the fine work they have done in ministering to the men in the services.

Referring to his recent trip to Europe, he said that he came back in a pessimistic frame of mind because of the horrible conditions he saw there. "I wonder if iron has really entered into the souls of Americans? I doubt it. We seem to be interested solely in pleasure and amusement, without even an awareness of the tragedy which is Europe today. It is certain that a united Christianity is essential if the world is to have a lasting peace."

He then went on to say that the Church today is preoccupied almost entirely with petty things and is neglecting the great issues that confront the world and the nation. He referred particularly to the missionary enterprise where he said the Episcopal Church was "merely playing at mission."

Bishop H. St. George Tucker, the Presiding Bishop, praised Bishop Manning for his moral leadership. He also expressed his gratitude to Bishop Manning for postponing the raising of funds for the completion of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine until the drive for the Reconstruction and Advance Fund is over.

Bishop Manning, responding to the nice things said about him, said, "I accept these kind words simply as a challenge and as something for me to try to live up to during the next twenty-five years or so."

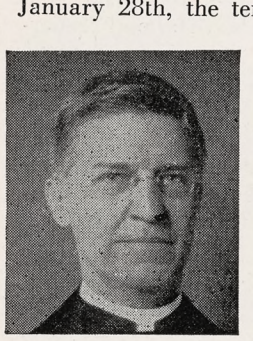
He declared that we are in a new era with "tremendous problems, unmeasured responsibilities, vast uncertainties and grave dangers." He then went on to say that it is the Christian religion which will give us social vision and "that freedom from race and class prejudice, that spirit of brotherhood toward all men, which the world situation now absolutely demands and upon which the hope of world peace depends."

To accept "the great words of the Prayer Book" is the surest way "to be conscious of our relationship with God" and so Bishop Manning declared that "we should not at this time enter upon another period of revision. Too frequent revision of that great book is weakening and unsettling to the spiritual life and work of the Church. What we need in the Church now is not to revise the Prayer Book but to believe, and teach, and live the Prayer Book."

Bishop Manning also paid a fine tribute to Bishop Charles K. Gilbert, praising him for the fine cooperation he has always given him and for the fine service he is rendering the diocese.

The chairman of the dinner was Judge Robert McC. Marsh, who is the president of the Church Club.

"Perhaps never since Darwin revolutionized thought have conditions been so favorable for Christianity," declared Judge Marsh in his introductory remarks. "But the difficulties which are appearing in London and the industrial strife in America, to take only two examples, even though these may subside for a time, suggest that the old forces are still at work and are not to be overcome without unprecedented effort. There is surely great danger that in spite of its fear of the atomic bomb the world will soon forget its desire to avoid war and will retract its recent confession of having neglected God, unless the Church as a whole makes a new effort to carry forward the banner of the Cross, not only to all the nations of the earth but to every form of social, educational, and industrial organization and institution. This may mean doing more than the Church has done for a thousand years but the time to move is now.



"It is a matter of good fortune," Judge Marsh continued, "that this first year after the war is the year for holding a General Convention. Churchmen will watch with intense interest the action of the Convention; will look to see what measures it takes to answer the Macedonian cry of the world. For the fund now being collected for use in foreign lands our National Council has chosen an inspiring name, Reconstruction and Advance. The two words belong together, for reconstruction is hardly worth while except to be followed by advance, nor can any significant advance be accomplished without some measure of essential reconstruction. Moreover, the phrase can, and should be, applied to rebuilding more than destroyed or outgrown physical plant. Some reconstruction of our habits of thought and of our forms of organization will surely be necessary to permit the Church to advance far in the great task of bringing the world back to God, through his Son, who is our Lord."

BISHOP LUDLOW IS HONORED

Newark, N. J.:—The clergy of the diocese of Newark paid tribute to Bishop Theodore R. Ludlow on January 28th, the tenth anniversary of his consecration as suffragan of the diocese. He celebrated at a service at Trinity Cathedral when an address was given by Bishop Sterrett of Bethlehem. Also taking part in the service were three other Bishops who took part in his consecration: Bishop Washburn of Newark, Bishop W. Appleton Lawrence of Western Massachusetts and Bishop Charles K. Gilbert of New York. The service was followed by a luncheon at the diocesan house when Bishop Ludlow was presented with a gift from the clergy. Bishop Ludlow is a member of the editorial board of THE WITNESS and is also on the executive committee of the Church Publishing Association for whom the magazine is published.

Washington:—When we received this picture from the navy the caption stated that it was a group of men on board a carrier listening to a broadcast of the world series. Anyone who has ever been to a world series game would know that there is no moment in a game that could possibly bring out such expressions. The artist, Fons Iannelli, informs us that he took the picture as men were listening to their final instructions about a landing that was to be made on an island in the Pacific. Rumors had been flying about for days so that all the men had a good idea what was about to happen. Yet a "This is it, official" expression is on the face of every man — suspense, fear, anxiety, "this-may-be-my-last day," without a word spoken as the men get their instructions below deck over a loud speaker.

This series of ten pictures, taken by Mr. Iannelli at sea while serving in the navy photo unit directed by Captain Edward J. Steichen, brings out the facts of war as words cannot — facts which we believe all should keep in mind. Two pictures will follow, completing the series.

SOCIAL WORKERS TO MEET

Boston: — The committee on the Church and social work, a long-standing committee which aims to keep Episcopal social workers infused with the spiritual side of their calling, and to aid in intelligent understanding of present-day social problems, will offer a Lenten program on the three last Wednesday evenings in March and the first Wednesday in April, based on the sensible idea of a 6:30 p.m. supper preceded by an hour's prayer and meditation and followed by an hour's discussion led by an authority on the matter in hand. The meetings end at 8:15. The series will be: "Our Work Is Faith," discussion leader, Dr. Miriam Van Waters; "Our Work Is Fellowship," Rabbi Liebman; "Our Work Is Worship," the Rev. Massey Shepherd, Jr.; "Our Work Is Ministry," the Rev. Howard P. Kellett.

Bill Patrick, U. S. Army chaplain, conducts a service for American soldiers at Viernheim, Germany. He is canonically a resident of the district of San Joaquin

ANGLICAN SOCIETY MEETS

New York:—The annual meeting of the Anglican Society, the purpose of which is to maintain the Catholic faith, was held here in January at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. The chief event was the dinner at which Dean H. S. Kennedy of Albany and Dean Welles of Buffalo, the president, were the speakers. Tribute was paid to the late Rev. Frederic W. Fitts, the resolution stating that "probably more than any other priest in America he carried out in his church the developed ceremonial of the English rite."

BISHOP DARST HAS ANNIVERSARY

Wilmington, N. C.:—The Kiwanis Club here paid tribute to Bishop Thomas C. Darst, retired bishop of East Carolina, on the 31st anniversary of his consecration. The event was also celebrated at a special service held at St. James' Church here at which Bishop Darst delivered a very moving address.

PRESBYTERIAN SPEAKS ON UNITY

Brooklyn, N. Y.:—The Rev. Herbert H. Field, former pastor of a Presbyterian Church in this city and now the stated clergy of the Presbytery of Brooklyn and Nassau, was the speaker at the meeting of the laymen's committee of the Episcopal Evangelical Fellowship. The meeting was held on February 5th at St. Bartholomew's. He spoke on how Presbyterians feel about unity with the Episcopal Church. The address was followed by a question period when both Presbyterian and Episcopalian laymen asked questions that received lively answers.

Bishop Davis Urges Realistic Approach to Marriage

Chairman of Commission Says Liberal Canon Will Be Presented at General Convention

By W. B. Spofford

Buffalo, N. Y.:—The commission on holy matrimony will present a new canon to liberalize the marriage law of the Church, it was announced on January 28th in an address given at the convention of the diocese of Western New York by Bishop Cameron J. Davis. He is the chairman of the commission charged with responsibility of presenting the report when the Convention meets in September in Philadelphia.

He pleaded for a "more realistic" approach to the whole matter of remarriage in his convention address, declaring that "in many cases it is a greater sin against God and society for couples to stay together than to separate."

"Remarriage in the Episcopal Church of persons whose previous marriages have been dissolved should be decided according to the individual merits of the case," Bishop Davis asserted.

"A blanket law in the field of human relations is directly contrary to the mind of Christ. I have seen many cases where it seemed that our Lord, Himself, would permit a remarriage — where society, the church and the people involved would have benefited — and have had to refuse to marry those people because our Church canon recognizes only nine or ten grounds of annulment and one of divorce.

"The commission feels, and I feel strongly, that the power of judgment in cases of remarriage should be vested in the bishop and a theological court.

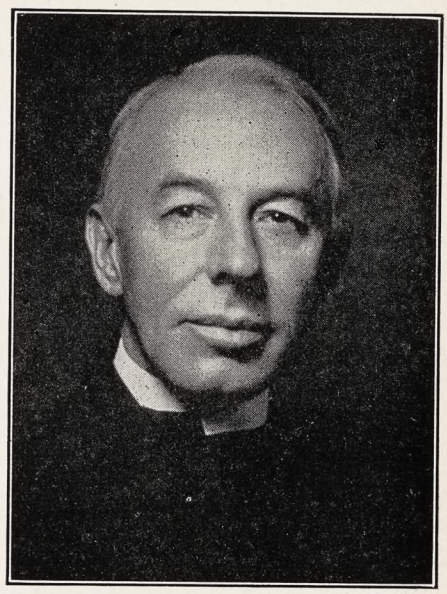
"In many cases it is a greater sin against God and society for couples to stay together than to separate, yet the Church is unable to remarry them because the grounds for their separation are not one of those approved by church law.

"A God-made marriage is and should be indissoluble. That is Christ's teaching. Such a marriage cannot be terminated. But most marital failures were never true marriages in the Christian sense. The couples were not free and competent to make a Christian marriage or there were physical and mental impediments that became apparent later."

NEW CHANCELLOR APPOINTED

Wilmington, N. C.: — Junius D. Grimes of Washington, N. C. has been appointed chancellor of the diocese of East Carolina by Bishop Thomas H. Wright. He succeeds George B. Elliott who is retiring after 25 years as chancellor.

END DISCRIMINATION URGES BISHOP



Little Rock, Ark.: — An amendment to the constitution and canons to end racial discrimination was urged by Bishop R. Bland Mitchell at the convention of the diocese of Arkansas. "We have white congregations," he declared. "but we all belong to the same Church. In all Christian brotherliness let us face it and make our basic law completely conform to it."

The Presiding Bishop was the guest of honor at the convention which marked the 75th anniversary of the diocese.

CLERGY GIVE TO FUND

Springfield, Mass.: — Forty-seven of the clergymen active in the diocese of Western Massachusetts have pledged $9,164 to the Reconstruction and Advance Fund, Bishop Lawrence has announced. Of the remaining 13, he said that all have pledged to the fund but in amounts not yet specified. The news of the 100 per cent cooperation of these clergymen in this drive was brought to the bishop by the Rev. Richard Preston, rector of All Saints' Church, Worcester. Early in the preparation for the campaign, Mr. Henry A. Field, diocesan chairman for the fund, said that the success or failure of this drive depended to a large extent upon the cooperation of the clergy. Acting on this suggestion, Mr. Preston, on his own initiative, decided to canvass all the clergymen and received pledges from all.

Expressing his appreciation of the wholehearted support of the clergy in this effort Bishop Lawrence said that if every one of the 19,000 communicants in the diocese did as well, the result would be more than $3,500,000 instead of nearly $150,000 which the diocese has figured is its proportionate share in the drive.

Bishop Cameron Davis announces that a canon liberalizing the marriage canons will be presented at General Convention in Philadelphia

CONVENTION OF LOUISIANA

New Orleans:—Following an address by Bishop Clingman of Kentucky, a member of the board of trustees of the Church Pension Fund, the convention of Louisiana, meeting here January 25th, expressed its approval to the proposal to increase the assessment on clergy salaries from 7½% to 10%. He also spoke on the work being done in the province of Sewanee, stressing particularly the increased interest in work with Negroes, which he described as being done "more intelligently and more seriously."

A resolution was adopted requesting Bishop Jackson to appoint a committee to aid rectors in securing appropriate music for services. It was stated in the discussion that church music was being increasingly secularized, particularly at weddings.

Most of the time of the convention was devoted to routine reports of possessed of new powers of destrucvarious departments and institutions.

General Convention deputies: clergy: G. M. Jones of New Orleans; W. H. Ness of New Orleans; Philip P. Werlein of Baton Rouge; Edward F. Hayward of Monroe. Alternates: J. H. Alves of Alexandria, D. H. Wattley of New Orleans; R. H. Manning of New Orleans; H. S. Giere of New Orleans. Laymen: Warren Kearny, Edward M. Rowley, Philip James and G. P. Chamberlain, all of New Orleans.

MRS. SIMKHOVITCH RETIRES

New York:—Mrs. Mary K. Simkhovitch, prominent in the Episcopal Church, retired on February 1 as the director of Greenwich House, a social settlement which has become world famous under her leadership. She founded the institution forty-three years ago. She is to continue to live at the settlement and is to retain her position as the only woman member of the city housing authority where she will continue her efforts at slum clearance and decent housing for people of low income.

Mrs. Simkhovitch has served as a member of the social service division of the National Council and is a member of the executive committee of the Church League for Industrial Democracy.

CANTERBURY WARNS THE WORLD

London (wireless to RNS):—The future security of the world rests upon the proper uses of power, Geoffrey Francis Fisher, Archbishop of Canterbury, declared at an intercessory service here for the United Nations General Assembly. The service was held at St. Margaret's Church in Westminster and was sponsored by the British Council of Churches.

"The existence within the democracies of power groups seeking to gain their ends by economic force," the Archbishop declared, "shows that even there the problem of power has not been solved. Almost for the first time, the United Nations are being forced to consider practically the right and wrong use of force in all its different forms, military, economic, and political, and the conditions which should govern its use and limit its claim to sovereignty."

Declaring that the world is just beginning to emerge "from the pit of destruction" only to find itself nation may enjoy its rightful liberties and dwell in peace. The problem of security is the problem of power and its use. All history shows that the right use of power is as difficult as its wrong use is disastrous."

The Archbishop stressed that any attempt to reconcile rivalries among the nations must be preceded by agreement that all powers are subordinate to the sovereignty of the law of justice, which means also the obligation to respect the individual man, his dignity and rights.

"When men and nations," he declared, "have learned to live by the law of justice, to honor God, and to honor man, there is a lesson still to be learned — the meaning of the mercy and love and charity of God, and its effect upon men.

"Nor can the first lesson be truly learned and obeyed except it be interpreted and directed by a second. The fact that God came to man in the impotence of human birth and with no power but that of the spirit shocks us out of the belief that power, as the world means it, is the secret of success or of security."

Prayers were offered at the service for "a just and durable peace" and a collection was taken up for Christian reconstuction in Europe. Taking part in the service with Dr. Fisher were: Canon Alan Campbell, rector of St. Margaret's; the Rev. A. McHardy, chief chaplain of the RAF, who represented the Moderator of the Church of Scotland; and Rev. Arthur Mitchell Chirgwin, who attended on behalf of the Moderator of the Free Church Federal Council.

Mrs. Mary K. Simkhovitch, prominent Episcopalian, retired on February 1 as director of famed Greenwich House, social settlement in New York, which she founded forty-three years ago

Sound the Quorum Call

THE public was indignant and the Congress of the United States was outraged a couple of weeks ago. The occasion was a publication of a picture taken, so the caption said, at the opening session of the Congress. It was a revelation of a room nearly empty of legislators, though the speaker's rostrum seemed to be normally occupied, indicating that our law-makers were once again officially at work. As one thought of the problems which needed and demanded their attention, both of public and presidential origin, one concluded that it was not too soon. But all of us would have been happier had all of our regularly elected representatives been in their places, anxious to tackle the job.

This unhappy indignation of the electorate was quickly registered in Congress,—for on the very next day it rushed into print to explain that all was much better along the Potomac than the camera had seemed to indicate. The acting speaker said that the picture that was made was "unfair and entirely erroneous." "Yes," said a colleague, "the photograph was taken between the opening prayer and the sounding of a quorum call."

Well, that explains everything. Our representatives in Congress assembled are ready for business, but not for prayer. Their trust in God, like that of most Americans, is absolute. Is it not safely and ineradicably embossed on our coins? Let God approve our mad designs if he will,—or overrule them if he must. Sound the quorum call when we are ready for business,—after the chaplain has said his prayer.

"QUOTES"

PROBABLY the most perplexing problem facing the Church in America today is to be found just here: how to readjust the existing Church structure so as to fit the present mature social and economic order. To solve this problem the principles of comity will have to be applied to a degree as yet uncontemplated. But even so comity will not be enough. Only through the organic union of many great communions can the number of local congregations be reduced to a number commensurate with present needs. With only 39 per cent of our 72,000,000 Church members really active, there is need to give far more attention than we have been giving to the qualitative character of the Church enterprise in America. Local churches must be made more effective units so that the percentage of loss and indifference is decreased. The quality of ministerial leadership must be raised. Lay leadership must become more effective.

Appeasement Again

ONE would think we might have learned a lesson in the war as to the frightful cost and stupidity of appeasement. Oil and scrap iron for Japan should have cured us forever of the policy. But we are still at it, thanks to certain groups in the state department. Airplanes are authorized sold to Spain and to Argentina. And this in spite not only of our hostility to these Charlie McCarthys of Nazism, but of the startling revelation that the Nazis long ago planned to carry on their struggle through Spain and Argentina in the event of their defeat in Europe.

This plot is clearly set forth, with documents, in The Plot Against the Peace by Kahn and Sayers, which we comment to all for careful reading. There one can learn of the plot of the German general staff to win world domination by carrying on after defeat through these two countries. It shows how German capital and German industry were transplanted to further the plan. How ironic to have transported three and a half million men to Europe to crush Nazism, at the cost of 260,000 dead and untold numbers of wounded, only now to have to fight the battle all over again in our own hemisphere. Here we are sending planes to Spain and Argentina to hasten the time when Nazism will challenge us again.

Is our state department insane or are they simply indulging in double talk while they fan and abet the forces of reaction? Every American should protest against this insolent betrayal of our dead and we would do well to demand an explanation from the state department. In our judgment it would not be too much to ask that those members of the department who engineered these sales be dismissed at once.

The Living Liturgy

By MASSEY H. SHEPHERD, JR.
Professor at Episcopal Theological School

The Treasury of Example

THE Prayer Book has a very sensible outlook with respect to the saints. They afford us a treasury of example, not of merit. Their "joy and triumph everlasting" is a crown we can all attain.

We do not pray to them, we pray with them; and our fellowship with them in the mystical Body is not superstitious, but living and real. Anyone who takes the trouble to compare our Prayer Book collects for saints' days with the corresponding ones in the Roman Missal will thank God for the Reformation. We do not deny that "the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much"; the intercession of the blessed ones on our behalf is very comforting. But only the merits of our Lord and Savior can "reconcile us unto God in one body by the cross"; and with Him as our Redeemer we have no need for any other access to the Father.

Having brought the Church back to a soundly Scriptural doctrine of the saints, the Reformers who compiled the Prayer Book apparently tried to underscore the idea by suggesting that there were no saints worthy of commemoration by the Church except those whose names appear in the New Testament. At least that is the implication of their drastic treatment of the Calendar. Even so some of the worthies of apostolic times were strangely omitted. We do know something about Timothy and Titus and Philip the evangelist (one of the Seven), and the missionary work which they accomplished. This is more than can be said of most of the Twelve. We do not even know the name of St. Bartholomew, only that of his father (for Bartholomew means 'son of Tolmai'). It is always mildly amusing to look up in a hymnal the "proper" appointed for St. Bartholomew's day. The hymn-writer has plenty of scope for his imagination. And what can we say about St. Matthias? He is never heard of again after his inclusion in the number of the Twelve. As Professor Luccock has said, he seems to have been swallowed up by his office. (We have known some bishops who undoubtedly stood in the Apostolical Succession from St. Matthias.) Then there is St. Jude. We may think better of him, though we may know less of him, now that Biblical scholarship has relieved him of the burden of authorship of the epistle ascribed to him. Our 1928 Prayer Book revisers were certainly well-advised when they substituted the present epistle for the Epistle of Jude on the festival of that apostle.

One almost faints with fear at the thought of the turmoil which will be created in our Church when we finally get up enough courage and honesty to make the whole Prayer Book square with what is universally accepted in modern Biblical criticism. Meanwhile we shall be sufficiently reminded by our Calendar that the Church has been built upon the foundation of the apostles, etc. Many of us wish that the Prayer Book also reminded us of other valiant saints who through the centuries have built up the fabric of the City of God — martyrs and confessors, teachers of the Faith and of the life of prayer, missionaries and heroes of devoted service, and statesmen-architects who have kept the Church firmly upon her unshakable apostolical foundations. Any extension of the Prayer Book Calendar will be a ticklish business, however. We all have our favorites that we want to see on the list. And then what a marvellous opportunity it will afford of throwing off those restraints upon our "envy, hatred, and malice, and all uncharitableness"—what is euphemistically called "partisan churchmanship."

Perhaps the root of our difficulty with revising the Calendar is too much reliance upon some of the antiquated criteria of selection employed by the early and medieval Church, and still carried on in the Roman Church in its machinery of canonization. But the only tests we can honestly apply today are those which conform to the canons of modern historical science. We must be done with legends and miracle-mongering. (The devil can work miracles, for that matter.) Yet there are some strange minds that would prefer to see on the Calendar the name of St. George, a mythical martyr, to that of Bishop Patteson, the fruit of whose martyrdom on the beach of Nukapu thousands of our own young men and women have lately witnessed in the Melanesian islands. Nor can I understand the mentality that would accept in a Prayer Book Calendar the names of Sir Thomas More and Bishop John Fisher (both of them admirable men, certainly), because the Pope recently canonized them, but balk at the names of Bishops Latimer and Ridley, the candle of whose pyre has lighted the spiritual freedom of the Church in England, a fire which, as Latimer prophesied, "by God's grace . . . shall never be put out."

What are the tests for canonization in a modern, "living Liturgy"? I submit these two: 1) Outstanding heroism and service in the cause of Christ, of which there is sufficiently authentic information edifying to the modern man; and 2) personal holiness (something not necessarily synonymous with asceticism and/or orthodoxy).

Church and Sex Relations

by George F. Tittmann

Chaplain in the United States Navy

I RECENTLY rounded out twenty months of close association with a group of six or seven hundred men, and of passing but often intimate acquaintance with many thousands of combat troops,—through six major amphibious assaults. Of course sex is exaggerated in fantastic ways in the monotony and the detachment from normal, all-around social intercourse. At home if you miss two meals in a row you know immediately how deep the food hunger is; but ordinarily, in the diversity of civilian pursuits, prolonged sexual hunger is absorbed. Out here you realize how at home normal, mixed fellowship sublimated the procreative instinct to a large extent and how everyday contacts with the opposite sex stabilized imagination and levelled off the ups and downs of desire. After a year and a half of only masculine company you find the sex drive isolated for examination and comment as never before. You live in an all-male atmosphere that enormously exaggerates thoughts of everything female. Thus my credentials for writing on this aspect of sex are certainly not my years of wisdom nor any graduate degree in the field, but simply that I have lived for a concentrated period among men of many types—laymen and doctors, rich and poor, wise and foolish, cold and hot—who as a group might be said to have become "specialists" on the subject. Some will say perhaps that a chaplain does not get to hear the truth from men on the sex question because they are naturally shy before the popular conception of his aloofness from the dirty world of facts. However, this is not necessarily the case. I have deliberately encouraged the most open and colloquially-worded discussions on sex, adultery and fornication, because I want to know how the men of this generation really feel about these things. I am definitely not an "authority," but I have come to the point where I feel that what I have found is worth bringing up for consideration.

To start with we might review some present-day facts. In the first place, a majority do not feel that peoples' indulging in a moderate amount of sexual intercourse before marriage is really worth considering as a problem,—and that attitude is a problem to begin with. I know many who might say that in theory fornication is wrong, but the same persons will confess by their general attitude and personal history that somehow things have gone too far to do anything about it. The average feeling seems to be that sexual intercourse is on the same level as the broad, amorous activity denoted by the word "necking," and anyone with half an eye open and a grain of honesty knows that varying degrees of such sexual experimentation short of intercourse itself is well-nigh universal.

In the second place, somewhere between six and eight out of every ten bachelors of twenty-one (a conservative estimate) have probably had intercourse, and most of them will admit it—given the proper atmosphere in a discussion. You can estimate from the opinions of those who have made a specialty of the experience that the percentage of girls who enter marriage with some practice in sexual intercourse is only a little lower than in the case of men, perhaps four or six out of ten. Reliability of statistics in this field is not easy to obtain, but when you find higher estimates almost everywhere these compromise figures cannot be far wrong. I am aware that many Church folk, especially those from the middle and upper income brackets, may take exception to these statistics. That is partly because diversions and sublimations of the sex urge are more possible for their own children who have had more money and education, and partly also because adults generally do not know their children so well as they think.

In the third place, it is a mistake to think that these young men are profligates or delinquents, or that they invariably come from broken families. That is just not true of a large majority. And men from fine backgrounds, often from Church families, are among those who have had their moments of coital experimentation too; the latter usually seem to agree more heartily that fornication is wrong—that is often the only difference.

So, someone should just get up in front of parents and teachers and Church folk who are interested in youth, and say in a loud voice: "the boy who passes twenty-one and has not fornicated is the exception and not the rule." It would help clear ground for a realism that might get us enthusiastic about the main source of control.

NOW, is it bad? If we can control venereal disease, and that is an accepted possibility, is fornication wrong? Now wait a minute! We are trying to see this thing clearly instead of camouflaging it by too much immediate emotional reaction. I don't mean that the reflex emotions of decent people on the subject are wrong,—quite the contrary; but they do obscure careful thought about it. Is fornication wrong? Do we really and truly believe that it is thoroughly and indubitably wrong? Why is it wrong?

In most of us who have been reared in the Christian atmosphere or in homes where normal and balanced youth activity was financially possible, there is an instinctive reaction to that question: "of course it's wrong. It goes against every decent feeling we have." Now to some extent (especially in former generations, I think) these strong, instinctive feelings of parents on the subject stick pretty firmly in children and give them foundations for like feelings which they pass on again in turn. I hope that will always be a powerful influence in spite of all opposition from the outside. But today young people are surrounded by a spirit of intellectual analysis, by powerful and omnipresent social suggestion, and by popular debunking of all tradition, which bit by bit tend to eat away those home-imbued foundations for the sanctity of sexual relations. Today, just to say "I somehow know it's wrong" carries less and less weight. More than ever there must be a reason for morals. Children are everlastingly bombarded among their own contemporaries by demands for logical demonstrations; "Prove it's bad!" is the cry. And when you get into the late teen-age group and among twenty-year olds, that insistence becomes almost a ritual. It is often so among men of thirty and older, too. Time and again I have introduced the question of just why we hold or do not hold to a certain moral standard in sex-expression, and, do you know, there is no simple reason that influences them much at all. They almost invariably do not want their children to be promiscuous, of course; and you find a rather pathetic state of apprehension in more mature fathers when they foresee the coming conflict between what they want for their children and what they can explain to them as right.

I've joined battle armed with all the persuasive reasons I know, again and again. "It's selfish. You can't be thinking much of the personality of the woman whose body you're using for a thrill." Bunk! they say. She likes it, or is getting paid for it, and there are plenty who seem to survive the ordeal and marry happily later. "Contraceptive methods are never one hundred per cent certain, and a young girl's life can be ruined if she gets pregnant before marriage." This is admitted to be true, except that the danger of bringing disgrace to a girl is often thought to be more a proof of a priggish contemporary social outlook than of the evil of fornication. Anyway, these long-term practical fears never seem to support moral standards and ideals very well, especially since careful use of contraceptives can largely eliminate the fear itself. "It cheapens sex indelibly so that you can never really know it for anything much more than a self-indulgent thrill—never the love-sacrament with endless depths which it can be." Bunk! they say. If you don't go hog-wild in promiscuity, fornication is only an advanced kind of kissing; and with sex-skill evidently so important in a successful marriage why shouldn't previous experience better prepare the way? "It establishes habits which lead later to adultery and the breakup of the home." Bunk! they say. A man can love a wife just as much—maybe more by contrast—no matter whether he enters marriage himself virgin or not. "It's a health problem, for no matter how much care you take in prophylaxis, individually,—since society is what it is, you can't help increasing venereal disease when you increase sexual intercourse." Bunk! they say. Doctors agree that if we only spread proper education and lift the taboo on sex information we can almost entirely eradicate venereal infection.

These are compelling and character-moulding ideas which young people meet on all sides, and I fear that in them there is, to some degree, more hard-shelled, practical truth than many care to acknowledge. Besides these, you must count in the implicit attitudes of "authority"—such as the armed forces, scientific medicine, high school with its instruction in physiology and hygiene—all of which are for the most part "morally neutral." But the neutrality on the sex question of an "authority" so weighty and respected in other fields is not neutrality at all. Regardless of the routine postscripts deploring promiscuity which influential "authority" might tack on to its pronouncements, the far more powerful, though hidden, suggestion has the practical effect of encouraging free sexual experiment. And so it goes. Add all this up, and you have a situation which thoughtful people simply cannot evade.

WHAT do we have left in such chaos? I believe that we must return to a very simple and tradition-honored principle. It is this: there is no really basic reason for chastity and continence except the religious reason. I do not mean that we must answer every question with pious phrases. Of course we must appeal to youth by every means, using every possible argument. But I do mean that it must all fundamentally rest—in our own hearts and ultimately in our outspoken convictions—on the simple and undisguised reason: "fornication is wrong because God does not want it." This is of course the basis for all Christian moral standards; it was God who spake these words and said the ten commandments and the sermon on the mount. But the pressure of the time must make us emphasize that foundation all the more, especially in this matter of the direction of the sex drive. Obviously everyone is not ready for such a forthright statement, but there are many ways to lead up to it by adjusting that basic appeal to each personality as it suits, making it fit the "dose of religiousness" which each can take. But, honestly, outside of faith in the law of God and his moral demands, is there ultimately anything on which we can test a case against fornication? "When you get close to Christ you somehow know that sexual intercourse, except for husbands and wives, just is not right." Such an appeal may leave our tough young intellectuals cold, but, Christian parents and teachers, what other answer have we really got?

Men are reduced to elemental dependencies in time of war. It is not war's least evil that its monotony and loneliness and insecurity color civilian life so that it appears as just a glorious chance at last to find sexual release. You feel rather helpless before that idea; it is so loud and so central and so commonly accepted in casual conversation. There is little you can do directly and you are puzzled as to what to say or do by the hint of subterranean areas in men's character that have begun to fall to pieces long before this surface corruption appeared. One thing however you do know—theoretically and personally—and you tell it to men again and again: the hunger of sex is so deep, so profoundly a part of man's humanness, that there just is no power to control it except the direct touch of Almighty God himself.

As the very solitary representative of Christianity and spokesman for the Church, after the chaplain has lived close to men in all stages of belief for long periods of time, he finds how clear the line is which marks off the Christian faith from the beliefs and presuppositions of the outside world. Today it is no longer the case that people are hostile to the Church just because they "misunderstand" Christianity. We have overworked the bromide that the United States is still really a Christian nation underneath it all. No, there is much more open revolt against the ethics and beliefs of the Church. Thus you cannot assume that Christian sex standards are generally accepted but just not always kept too well; it is more a matter of people rejecting Christianity whose ethical implications they understand quite well indeed. So if people cannot acknowledge in the first place the kind of God who wants us to use sex for his purposes, then persuasive reminders and morality lectures are not what they primarily need at all. Their need, very simply, is for faith.

LASTLY, therefore, the problem of fornication is primarily a problem which the Church should meet. The world, which belongs to God, must find its way lighted by the Church which alone can help men to understand God. The Church should instruct and inspire her own in the purposes and right, normal use of the sex urge, speaking to young people and parents,—but also to youth leaders, community planners and teachers, for the Church's indirect influence permeating society is the over-all and long-term power in sex guidance—not just Christian moral preaching to those of the inner circle. We must come to see finally and clearly, we who cherish and understand the Church, that the Church alone knows what sex is all about. The purpose of sexual intercourse is both for bringing children into the world and to give to husband and wife a marvelous physical expression of that spiritual force called "love" which binds families together. But sex-hunger is a volcanic force, and its decent control and divinely-intended use demand not just factual information, but spiritual power; not just a determination of human will, but an inner redemption and change of desire itself; not just exhortations to chastity, but the sanctifying renewal of holy spirit deep inside the whole personality. Apart from this there is only secret, sordid opportunism, much hypocrisy hiding moral decay, or outright, universal license.

Are we of the Church doing our job here? The taboos are everywhere being lifted. The old demons of false prudery and the sub-Christian contempt for sexual expression are evacuating the premises of the modern mind. Who shall enter in now to govern this empty house which is swept clean of high moral ideals and the beauty of sheer goodness we all long for? A prominent preacher, lecturing to parsons on how to preach and what to say, once declared: "I would not touch the subject of sex with a ten foot pole." This is the voice of a Church which could rest on inherited respect—when those who were not against us were our allies. But today, brethren, the time is short, the breath of the coming tempest stirs the dust of all inherited authority, he who is not for us now is our foe, and on this tumultuous issue a silent Church will have betrayed mankind and its Lord.

*Spiritual Letters of Fénelon, translated by Mildred Whitney Stillman, Cornwall, New York. Idlewild Press.

This is another "little book" of spiritual directions, but it is an indispensable contribution to this literature, as it consists of letters written by a man of the world to two worldly people. This is the book to give those who find Brother Lawrence "too good," or Thomas a Kempis "too dry."

It is a pity the translator did not give more of a portrait of Fénelon. He was a born charmer and a born teacher. He turned his palace into a hospital. But he was bothered by his ambition and supple tact, and the complexity of his soul. This would endear him to many other complex souls. And the heresy which drove him from court (Quietism: "The soul contemplating God perfectly neither longs for salvation nor fears Hell" has an appealingly modern ring. A page or two of biography would have helped the average reader.

The smooth simplicity of Fénelon's style, which allowed him to use long sentences with absolute clarity, has been gracefully preserved in translation.

*A Manual of Eastern Orthodox Prayers. Macmillan, 90c.

The Fellowship of St. Alban and St. Sergius again contributes to our western appreciation of Eastern Orthodoxy by this anthology of prayers and hymns drawn from the great Euchologion and other liturgical books of the Orthodox Churches. Some of these devotions appear in English for the first time. Included in the manual are the order of Confession, both in the Greek and the Slavonic use, the prayers before and after Holy Communion, and a Calendar of holy-days. Nicholas Zernov, who furnishes brief explanatory notes, writes regarding the spirit of these prayers, in so far as they show distinctively Eastern characteristics, that they exhibit "the acute realization of man's enslavement to sin, a deep sense of the Divine majesty and glory, and the frequent references to the Mother of God." Those who would find deep devotion expressed in poetry of high quality will keep this little manual near at hand.

Michigan to Elect Suffragan At Special Convention

Bishop Frank Creighton Declares It Is Only Way to Get Episcopal Assistance Immediately

Edited by Sara Dill

Detroit: — The diocese of Michigan is to have a suffragan bishop, to be elected at a special convention at St. Paul's Cathedral on March 26th. The action was taken at the convention meeting here January 23-24. Bishop Creighton, in making the request, stated that it was the only way the diocese could have immediate Episcopal assistance since the resignation of Bishop Aldrich as Coadjutor cannot be acted upon until the House of Bishop meetings in September.

A considerable number expressed the wish for a coadjutor to succeed Bishop Aldrich, coadjutor who recently resigned, but the vote strongly supported Bishop Creighton.

Lewis B. Franklin, treasurer of the National Council, was the speaker at the convention dinner, attended by about 600 men and women.

A proposed new canon on marriage was presented by a committee of the department of social relations, which combines features of two canons that were debated at the Cleveland General Convention, with a resolution passed urging the 1946 Convention to adopt a canon "along these lines."

Equalization of clergymen's salaries in the diocese on the basis of marital status, number of children, and length of total service in the ministry was voted down by the convention.

The committee proposed that the diocesan offices receive the salary appropriations of all parishes and missions and distribute them among the clergy, allowing $2,100 a year for single clergymen; $2,640 for married clergymen; $300 a year for each child under 18; and $200 for every five years in the ministry. Adoption of the proposal would have meant a decrease in stipend of $3,860 for one clergyman of the diocese and of $2,500 or more for two others. The largest individual increase under the plan would have been $2,240. The committee said 58 clergymen among the 80 whose salaries were studied, would receive average increases of $900 a year, and 22 would have decreases averaging $1,250. In the debate preceding rejection of the proposal the convention delegates indicated they would be more receptive to some form of minimum salary proposal.

A plan presented by the delegation from Rochester, Mich., to assess each communicant $5 annually to provide a fund for building new churches was referred to a committee for further study.

Miss Mary L. Pardee, president of the Auxiliary of Connecticut, and Miss Ellen Gammack of the national office of the Auxiliary, addressed the convention of the Woman's Auxiliary.

Aid for Strikers

New York: — A number of outstanding Churchmen are serving on a committee to aid the strikers of General Motors. Letters have gone to members of the Methodist Federation for Social Service over the signature of Bishop Oxnam, while one signed by Bishop Parsons has been sent to members of the Church League for Industrial Democracy. The executive secretary of the CLID has also signed an appeal for aid for the striking workers of Western Union which is being mailed to Church people. Bishop Scarlett of Missouri is also a member of the GM workers aid committee, along with leaders of other Churches. Any caring to aid either group of workers should make their checks payable to "W. F. Cochran, Treas." and mail to the CLID, 155 Washington Street, New York 6, N. Y.

School of Religion

Providence:—A school of religion is being sponsored on Monday evenings during February by the department of education of the diocese of Rhode Island. The Rev. David W. Norton, vicar of St. Stephen's, Boston, is giving a course on doctrine; the Rev. Thomas J. Bigham Jr. of the General Seminary on liturgics; Mr. Richardson Wright of New York on stewardship; Canon A. C. Larned on the work of the altar guild; Mrs. Minot C. Crowell on the arrangements of flowers; the Rev. T. H. McCrea, assistant at St. Martin's, where the school is being held, is lecturing on symbolism and use of altar furnishings. The school is also offering a course for lay readers taught by the Rev. A. F. Roebuch, rector of St. Mary's, Portsmouth.

Visits Colombia

New York:—Bishop Reginald H. Gooden of the Panama Canal Zone recently paid a visit to survey the work being done in Colombia by the Rev. George F. Packard. His tour included Cali, Bogota, Medellin, Cartagena, Barranquilla, El Centro, Pato, and in each place he conducted services or preached, both in English and Spanish. At Cartagena the Bishop confirmed the first person in Colombia to be confirmed by a bishop of the Episcopal Church. "It may be of interest," the Bishop commented, "to note that Bishop Harry Beal had married that person on his first trip to Cartagena some five years ago."

"To say that Colombia or any other of our Latin American neighbors is 100 per cent Roman Catholic is like claiming that the United

★ We have the names of a considerable number of men available for positions. Likewise we have a list of positions that are seeking men—one just came in for instance for an assistant in a midwest parish that will pay from $3,000 to $4,000 depending on experience, age, etc. Our procedure is as follows: twice each month we send to men seeking positions the list of rectorships and assistant positions, with the name in each case of the proper person to write. Then we send to the parishes, or to rectors seeking assistants, the names of men seeking positions. It is impossible for us, at least at this stage of the game, to give individual attention to the many inquiries that come in. We will however, unless we become swamped, send these mimeographed reports to those who are genuinely interested in seeking a man for a position or vice versa. We do ask however that no one ask for these reports merely to satisfy their curiosity. Address letters to Get-Together: THE WITNESS, 135 Liberty Street, New York 6, N. States is 100 per cent Protestant and that every citizen is an active churchgoer," Bishop Gooden said. "I have lived in Spain and in Latin America for over twelve years and feel that there is good reason to believe that our branch of Christ's Church is a 'natural' for thousands of liberal and God-fearing people south of the Rio Grande. Colombia is a beachhead into South America. It is the only place in that continent where the Church is making preparations for Spanish-speaking work. This month we sent a Colombian to the Virginia Theological Seminary to prepare himself for work in that field. We need more, many more."

Newark Auxiliary

Newark, N. J.:—The Rev. Gardiner M. Day, rector of Christ Church, Cambridge, was the speaker February 6th at the meeting of the Auxilary of Newark, meeting at the diocesan house. He spoke on the Church's social and economic responsibility in the world today. Also on the program was Mrs. Allan P. Ames of Nutley, former secretary of social relations, who spoke on proper standards for domestic labor.

Talks on UNO

Boston:—The feature course at the diocesan school which opens this evening at the cathedral here and meeting on successive Thursdays is on the United Nations Organization. A number of experts, several of whom attended the San Francisco Conference, are giving lectures. In addition the school is offering twelve courses on various aspects of Church life.

Praise for Franco

Madrid (wireless to RNS): — Tribute to Franco for his efforts to improve the living standards of the people was paid by Cardinal-elect Archbishop Enrique Pla y Deniel, primate of Spain, at the dedication of a new housing development in Toledo for workers' families. Wellesley Conference

Wellesley, Mass.: — The conference for Church work, known as the Wellesley Conference, will be held this year for the first time in four years. The dates are June 24-July 3, with Bishop Keeler of Minnesota the chairman and with a faculty lined up to give courses in various fields of Church activity.

Mission of Help

New York:—The annual meeting and conference of the Church Mission of Help was held here February 5-7, opening with a meditation by the Rev. Grieg Tabor, rector of the Church of St. Mary the Virgin. Others on the program were the Rev. Seward Hiltner of the Federal Council who spoke on psychiatry; Mrs. Sallie Bright on promotion; the Rev. Almon Pepper on the community; Mr. Clarence King of the School of Social Work on the responsibility of staff members; Miss Daphne Hughes of Newark on vocational guidance for youth and the Rev. Gordon E. Brant of Chicago on how the organization can reach the youth of parishes. The annual luncheon was presided over by the Rev. Charles W. Sheerin, rector of the Epiphany, Washington, who is the national president.

Sixty Thousand Wives

New York: — The cause of internationalism was furthered at least in one way by the war. The Presiding Bishop, in a letter last week to bishops, informed them that sixty thousand American service men had taken themselves British wives, and that of these 35,000 are to come to the United States this month and next. "I hope you will bring this situation to the attention of your clergy," Bishop Tucker wrote, "asking their cooperation in making those of the wives who are Church

Why Has the Catholic Church

Supported { Mussolini, Hitler, Tiso, Franco, Salazar, Peron } **?

Why did the Catholic Church support Roosevelt's domestic policies and oppose his foreign policy?

Why is the Catholic Church anti-Capitalist as well as anti-Communist?

What kind of a political, social, and economic system is the Catholic Church attempting to bring about?

How has this affected your life, and how may it affect the lives of your children?

of England women feel at home in our own Church. Of course one difficulty is that many of the soldiers to whom they are married are not Episcopalians. I hope however that our clergy will be on the lookout during the next month for the arrival of any of these British wives and will give them every opportunity possible to join in the fellowship of the Church."

The letter was prompted by a cable from a chaplain in England asking about the "reorientation of Church of England GI brides into the American Episcopal Church."

Church Fraternity

Jamaica, N. Y.: — Fifty delegates representing the Phi Sigma fraternity for high school boys held their first convention Jan. 19-20 at Grace Church here. Modelled on college fraternity lines, the society is dedicated to service of the Church and was founded by the Rev. Joseph H. Titus, rector of Grace Church. A recent expansion program has established chapters in Christ Church, Bay Ridge, and St. Elizabeth's, Floral Park, with others in process of formation. Details will be sent to any interested if they will write Mr. Titus.

Relief for Japan

Indianapolis (RNS):—Lifting of restrictions preventing the shipment of goods to Japan was urged here at a meeting of the United Christian Missionary Society. The resolution said, "We urge the government authorities to take immediate steps to make possible the shipment of food, clothing, and building material to Japan and assure them of the support of this organization in providing supplies through voluntary agencies and influencing public opinion."

Planned Parenthood

New York:—Planned parenthood rests upon moral foundations, is designed to preserve the family, enrich the personality of the child and benefit society, Methodist Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam declared at the anniversary dinner of the Planned Parenthood Federation of America here. Citing the dictators as examples of those who called for large families under the guise of patriotic appeals, Bishop Oxnam asserted that the attacks on planned parenthood were made to foster the power designs of certain groups.

"They desired the insurance that lies in vast numbers," Bishop Oxnam said. "No group, whether political, social, or ecclesiastical, should be allowed to hide its true purpose in moral platitudes, when the real objective is to breed itself into a majority. This is the old interest in power, not a true interest in personality."

Recognizing the "social and moral obligations to bring into the world a sufficient number of healthy children to perpetuate and improve the race," the bishop added that "reasonable persons also know that for a woman to bear a child in each one of her child-bearing years is unjust to mother and child, as well as unfair to society."

Church For Deaf

Jackson, Miss.:—Plans for erection of a church for the deaf at Moss Point, Miss., were announced by Bishop Duncan M. Gray, of Mississippi at the Council of the diocese here. The new church will be built under the supervision of the Rev. Robert C. Fletcher, missionary to the deaf in the province of Sewanee.

Bishop Gray also endorsed the movement to erect a chapel at All Saints Episcopal College, Vicksburg, in memory of Bishop Theodore DuBose Bratton, bishop of Mississippi until his death in 1944.

Leader Urges Unity

Paris (wireless to RNS): — Marc Boegner, president of the French Protestant Federation, has issued an appeal here to Christian churches "to put aside their differences and find a unity based on the fundamentals of Christ's teaching." His appeal was published in the newspaper Figaro in connection with the annual Week of Prayer for Christian Unity observed by all denominations in Paris.

The Protestant leader also called for a clear definition of the churches' mission, "particularly in face of the Communist desire to convert the nations to their way of thinking." He said the Week of Prayer was of special importance in view of the forthcoming meeting of the Provisional Committee of the World Council of Churches in Geneva.

Educators Confer

New York:—Religious educators of the province of New York and New Jersey met last week with a number of leaders expressing themselves on what they think is wrong with church schools. The Rev. Charles Gomph of Newark stated that "the primary requirement of a sound Christian education should be the cultivation of the love of our Lord. A great deal that is wrong with education is its theory, which has no periphery because it has no center."

WITNESS columnist Bill Grime declared that religious facts "must be translated into life and living or there is no Christian learning." F. Ernest Johnson, professor at Columbia, a Presbyterian, pointed out that the Christian religion is an absolutist faith, operating on the basis of a body of given truth and he defined successful education as being the correct relating of this truth to the problems of our day. He also expressed the opinion that the future belongs to the liturgical Churches.

Others to speak were the Rev. Daniel McGregor, head of the national department of religious education; Miss Deborah Vail, religious educator of Central New York; Evelyn Spickard of the Intercession, New York; Mrs. Harold Kelleran of New Berlin, N. Y.

Half Million Raised

Syracuse, N. Y. (RNS): — How several Church groups raised $500,000 in 36 hours was told here by Robbins W. Barstow, director of the commission for world council service, relief arm of the World Council of Churches. Recently he received a cablegram from World Council headquarters at Geneva, Switzerland, that valuable army stores were available if $500,000 in cash could be secured — stores needed acutely for relief. Immediately he got in touch with the headquarters of the National Lutheran Council, which gave $100,000. A telephone call to headquarters of the Missouri Lutheran Synod brought promise of another $100,000. The Presbyterian Church in the USA gave $50,000; the Methodist Church $50,000; the Episcopal Church $35,000; and the Congregational-Christian Churches $25,000. Soon the whole amount was pledged — in 36 hours.

Criticizes Catholics

Columbus, Ohio:—A call for true religious liberty in the world was made at the opening of the annual Ohio Pastors Convention here. Issuing the appeal, Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam, head of the New York area of the Methodist Church, expressed the criticism of "political practices" of the Roman Catholic Church.

"The history of the Roman Catholic Church and of the Protestant churches is marred by intolerance, denials of religious liberty and, at times, outright persecution," he asserted. "I believe I speak for American Protestantism when I say it is our sincere purpose to guarantee religious liberty to all men."

Bishop Oxnam demanded recognition of the right of individuals everywhere to religious liberty. This liberty, he said, should include "freedom to worship according to conscience and to bring up children in the faith of their parents; freedom for the individual to change his religion; freedom to preach, educate, publish and carry on missionary activities, and freedom to organize with others, and to acquire and hold property for these purposes. "The Roman Catholic Church approaches the question of religious liberty from two points of view, one from principle, and the other from expediency. As a matter of principle it holds 'It is not lawful for the state . . . to hold in equal favor different kinds of religion.' . . . Now on the basis of expediency, the Church tolerates the separation of the Church and state, and the fact of other churches.

"We deplore religious division. We rejoice in such statements and practices as are revealed by such an Archbishop as Lucey of San Antonio. We call upon the Roman Catholic Church to be a Church and not attempt to be a state and a Church. We shall bring such practices to light that we believe constitute a threat to religious freedom. We shall speak firmly but in brotherly spirit. All we ask is that the Roman Catholic Church in matters of religious liberty do unto others as it would be done by."

Army Report

Atlanta, Ga. (RNS):—A total of 4,114,366 military personnel attended 53,067 Sunday and weekly religious services in the Fourth Service Command area during 1945 according to a report made public here by Chaplain Ralph W. Rogers. In the same period chaplains performed 2,022 marriages, conducted 336 funerals and baptized 710.

Compiled from individual reports of 1,316 Protestant, Jewish, and Catholic chaplains, religious preferences of Fourth Service Command personnel showed 62.52 per cent Protestant, 28.33 per cent Catholic and 4.70 per cent Jewish. Only 4.45 per cent indicated no religious preference.

Personnel Work

New York:—There are now in the Church in the United States, fifty-five diocesan personnel chairmen and two provincial personnel chairmen, all appointed since the Woman's Auxiliary Triennial in Cleveland three years ago. "The office of diocesan personnel chairman is the newest office in the Woman's Auxiliary, but one of the oldest interests," Mrs. Arthur Sherman commented recently. With the continuing and growing interest in personnel on the part of women of the Church, and with the need for more and more carefully selected missionaries, college workers and directors of Christian education, the diocesan personnel committee is being developed as a means of bringing the need and the interest together.

Miss Ellen Gammack, Personnel Secretary at national headquarters, meets periodically with the diocesan chairmen, and supplies them with material. The first major conference was held last September at Windham House. Chairmen of the Fifth Province will meet March 7 and 8 at Evanston, Ill.; those of the Fourth Province will meet in April and chairmen of the Eighth Province will meet in May.

The purpose is to have a committee of experts in each diocese—a group of women well informed as to openings, needs, qualifications, and training required. As an example, under Mrs. George Bland's leadership, the Pennsylvania committee is becoming thoroughly informed by having women from the fields of

Presbyterian Drive

Atlantic City, N. J. (RNS):—One million new members will be the goal of a nationwide three-year evangelistic campaign of the Presbyterian Church, it was announced by the denomination's national commission on evangelism after a three-day conference here. George E. Sweazey, of New York, commission secretary, described the proposed drive as the most auspicious ever undertaken by the Church and said it will be directed mostly toward winning young people into membership.

The drive will attain full impetus by May 21, Sweazey said, when the commission meets again with 500 ministers and lay leaders joining efforts for the huge campaign. This will be two days before the annual session of the General Assembly, also to take place in this city.

Sweazey said special courses of training will be developed for youth already members of the Church in order that they may attract other young people into the fold.

"The major phase of this campaign," he explained, "will be establishment of area schools of visitation evangelism by which Church members will make personal calls on their neighbors. Another phase will be the preaching of evangelism in special services in the more than 10,000 churches of our denominations."

PAUL ROBERTS
Dean of St. John's Cathedral, Denver

The article by Herbert Prince (WITNESS, January 10) says in a much better way than I could possibly say it what has been in my mind about the Reconstruction and Advance Fund. I have looked through the literature hoping to find some word showing that the Church was going to work for a brave new world, at least in the area of Christian missions. But there seems to be nothing contemplated except a rebuilding on much the same lines as before. There is no great challenge in that to add hope and eagerness and enthusiasm to the program. The world is in such a desperate plight that multitudes are easily talking about a third world war, which might finish what we call Christian civilization, and we seem to have little or nothing to offer to change the picture. The wise men went home another way, and if we are wise we will go into the future in another way than the old way that has meant such tragedy and chaos. There seems to be little heart-searching and penitence within the Church for our own ecclesiastical sins.

We talk about nations getting together and relinquishing sovereignty when we cannot do anything of the sort within the Christian Church. The tragedies of war are manifold. It means destruction to the tools with which we work to rebuild civilization and our Fund plans to restore these. But the worst effects of war come from what it does to persons and the Church needs to work in that area above all others, in creating love instead of hatred, fellowship across national, social, racial, ecclesiastical barriers. War is an indication of a disease and in that disease of narrowness and selfishness and prejudice and bigotry the Church shares.

This is a time for greatness. Perhaps we will never have such an opportunity offered to us again. It is right to have some of the money go for European need although that could be cared for in other ways, but more closely related to this particular fund and its purpose would be a strong movement toward closer cooperation and planning together by as many of the Christian Communions as will, for a united effort to save Christianity in the East.

This may be part of the reason for the lack of enthusiasm reported in the last meeting of the National Council. I can only speak for myself but I would feel very much more strongly about it all if I felt that the Episcopal Church was looking toward a new day.

A beginning might be made in the area of race relations here at home. The Church needs to lead the way and could certainly do it in the training for the ministry. There is an appeal for the very poorly equipped Bishop Payne Divinity School for Negroes. What a grand chance the Reconstruction and Advance Fund gives to end segregation in (of all places) the training of the Christian ministry. There is no more important need of our world than brotherhood among all races of men that dwell on the face of the whole earth.

If we are really to advance, let's think of some advances into some areas where there would be needed an adventurous spirit. "Man shall not live by bread alone," by new buildings and tools, but by a new spirit and fellowship. Enthusiasm goes hand in hand with adventure.

JOHN J. WILSON
Layman of Bethel, Vermont

I do not feel that Mr. Mainwaring's use of the word Catholic in his letter of January 17 should pass without comment. Would he limit its meaning to the Church as portrayed in the New Testament or would he want to add all the changes of the ensuing centuries against which the Protestant protests. To protest against such changes from the original faith and Church is an honorable duty and when the first three American bishops established the Church they adopted the name Protestant Episcopal, which name it has stoutly retained through constant efforts to have the word "Protestant" dropped.

Layman of Tillicum, Washington

Bishop Lawrence should feel proud of Mr. Winslow Ames who champions his cause so forcefully (WITNESS, Jan. 17). However I think his reputation as a gentleman suffers when he stoops to using the language of a common bully. It reminds one of the saying prevalent in the legal profession, "When you have a bad case abuse your opponent."

In my letter I criticized Bishop Lawrence for taking up too much space to discuss a subject which I considered had no logic or spiritual value. It will also be noticed that Mr. Ames is great on verbosity but in reality he says nothing of value. He merely cusses me for having the temerity to criticize a bishop of the Church. And why not? Is Mr. Ames one of those people who thinks that priests of the Episcopal Church should be regarded in the same light as the Roman Catholic priesthood, infallible? I stand solidly behind every statement in my original letter, Mr. Ames not-with-standing, and repeat that when the peoples of the world come to the conclusion that wars, like other crimes, do not pay and decide to try peace instead then indeed we can "beat our swords into plowshares and our spears into prunning hooks" but so long as there is a potential enemy in this pagan world planning to attack and pillage his neighbors, pure horse sense demands that we rely on something more practical than wishful thinking if we hope to survive.

General Convention Is Challenged

"THERE is surely great danger that in spite of its fear of the atomic bomb the world will soon forget its desire to avoid war and will retract its recent confession of having neglected God, unless the Church as a whole makes a new effort to carry forward the banner of the Cross, not only to all nations of the earth but to every form of social, educational and industrial organization and institution. This may mean doing more than the Church has done for a thousand years, but the time to move is now. It is a matter of good fortune that this first year after the war is the year for holding a General Convention. Churchmen will watch with intense interest the action of the Convention; will look to see what measures it takes to answer the Macedonian cry of the world. For the fund now being collected for use in foreign lands, our National Council has chosen an inspiring name; Reconstruction and Advance. The two words belong together, for reconstruction is hardly worth while except to be followed by advance, nor can any significant advance be accomplished without some measure of essential reconstruction. Moreover, the phrase can and should be applied to rebuilding more than destroyed or outgrown physical plant. Some reconstruction of our habits of thought and of our forms of organization will surely be necessary to permit the Church to advance far in the great task of bringing the world back to God, through his Son, who is our Lord."

These challenging words of Robert McC. Marsh, president of the Church Club of New York, with his permission we make our own. Further, we are to implement the challenge with the series during Lent on issues we believe should be faced by the Convention: A Basic Strategy for the Whole Church; the Relationship of the National Council to the Church; Unity with Presbyterians; the Marriage Canon; Prayer Book Revision; Social Reconstruction; Internationalism and the Church; Clergy Placement; Social Security for Lay Employees; Qualifications for a Presiding Bishop. Careful reading of these articles, written by outstanding leaders, will, we believe, aid materially in making the 1946 Convention the most significant one in the history of the Protestant Episcopal Church. With Judge Marsh we say, "The time to move is now." —The Editors

Unity Commission Criticized For Inactivity by Ohio

Declare It a Misfortune That No Report Is Received in Time for Diocesan Meetings

By Hilda Hutson

Cleveland: — The convention of Ohio, meeting at Trinity Cathedral, January 29th, called upon General Convention "to take some definite action regarding the purpose of reaching organic unity with the Presbyterian Church" and also went on record "as being in favor of this organic unity." The resolution, voted upon by the 93 clergy and 184 laymen who attended the convention, followed a report by the diocesan commission on approaches to unity, presented by the Rev. John R. Stalker, chairman, rector at Massillon.

BISHOP TUCKER

After expressing its regret that "there is not much progress to report in our unity dealings with the Presbyterian Church" the commission reported that "we of the Ohio commission stand ready to go forward in the relationships with our Presbyterian brethren but we have been forced to wait for leadership from the commission on approaches to unity of the General Convention. Evidently there is some sort of a deadlock in this commission of the General Convention because no report or communication has come from the commission to the Church during the past year. This is a great misfortune to the Church because whatever the commission proposes should have been in the hands of the diocesan conventions for debate long before this.

"But we have not been entirely idle in unity activity in the diocese of Ohio during the year 1945. On Sunday, October 28, there was the annual exchange of pulpits between the clergy of the diocese of Ohio and the ministers of the Presbyteries of northern Ohio. Thirty-two of the rectors of the diocese have reported that they made this exchange and from all of them has come news of cordial relationships, which have been nurtured by this Christian friendliness. We hope that this exchange of pulpits will be continued in Ohio, and that it will bring Our Lord's blessing upon the people of the two Churches.

"In some cases there have been joint meetings of vestries and sessions in different communities of the dioceses during the past year. These joint meetings are particularly valuable because real unity must come between the people of the two Churches and these joint meetings have shown plainly that differences between Christians of the Protestant Episcopal Church and Christians of the Presbyterian Church are not so many and so great as many people would have us believe.

"Your diocesan commission has received from several vestries of the diocese resolutions setting forth their interest in the effort being made toward unity with the Presbyterian Church and their hope that these efforts will be continued with final success. These communications from the vestries have been spontaneous and it has seemed to the chairman of your commission that they are an evidence of real interest in and deep desire for this unity between the two Churches.

"Your commission on approaches to unity asks that the commission be continued during the next year and that it be instructed to go on with its work of cooperation with the Presbyterian Church."

A resolution offered by Dean Chester B. Emerson condemning the practice of filibuster against any bill before Congress was also adopted. Communications were ordered sent to Senators Taft and Hoffman urging them to stop the present filibuster against the Fair Employment Practices bill by voting for cloture. The resolution was also sent to all Congressmen of northern Ohio.

General Convention Deputies: clergy: Chester B. Emerson, Walter F. Tunks, John R. Stalker, Donald Wonders. Laymen: Laurence H. Norton, William G. Mather, Harvey S. Firestone Jr., John W. Ford.

Bishop Tucker in his convention address made a strong plea for support of the Reconstruction and Advance Fund, tying it up with world peace. "As citizens," he declared, "we can do our part to form public opinion in support of a strong united nations organization to build the outward structure of world cooperation and peace. It is, however, the religion of Jesus Christ alone which can furnish the motive and the soul of such an organization, for the foundation of the Christian creed is the conviction that every human individual, regardless of nationality or race, is sacred in the eyes of God."

REACHING OUT TO NON-ROMANISTS

Washington: — Campaigns to put a Roman Catholic newspaper into every non-Catholic home throughout the country was urged here by Archbishop Murray of St. Paul in announcing the observance this month of Catholic Press Month. For sixteen years the Roman Church has given a whole month to a campaign for subscriptions for their papers, with the result that they now have a weekly total of 10,654,918. The Archbishop now proposes a total weekly circulation of another ten million among non-Catholic families.

The Episcopal Church has no Church Press Week—or even Church Press Day—let alone Church Press Month. The result is that the total circulation of THE WITNESS, the Churchman, the Living Church and the Southern Churchman is at the most 40,000 copies in a Church with one and a half million communicants.

It is perhaps something to think about when you are debating whether or not to do anything about getting THE WITNESS into the homes of your parish this Lent while the series on General Convention is being featured.

BISHOP LARNED VISITS GENEVA

Geneva, Switzerland:—In sending us the picture of Bishop J. I. Blair Larned, in charge of American Churches in Europe, M. Robert Root, a secretary of the department of Re construction and Inter-Church Aid of the World Council, writes that the Bishop expressed his gratitude to the staff of the Council for having had services for the 100 Americans at the church here. The background of the picture, so Photographer Wood reminds us, is the council grounds.

Writing later from Paris to the Presiding Bishop, Bishop Larned says that immediately after peace representatives of the World Council took responsibility for services at Emmanuel Church until a new rector could be secured. This they are continuing to do until the arrival of the Rev. Ronald H. Roland of Baltimore who will soon become the rector of this, the only American Church in Geneva.

Bishop Larned also is deeply impressed with the work being done by the World Council. "Many temporary wooden church halls have been erected," he said, "both in France and Holland, almost on the ruins of their former churches, and many more have been ordered for these countries as well as Belgium. Aid has been given to increase the very inadequate pastors' salaries; youth work has been supported; Bibles and evangelistic literature provided in many tongues; theological writings reprinted; holidays provided in Switzerland for war-worn pastors; libraries of recent theology in various languages provided for theological faculties and for ministers who have lost all; orphanages and institutions aided, home missions and evangelism encouraged; indeed there is no work of the Churches which does not receive every consideration and there is no Church outside our desire to help."

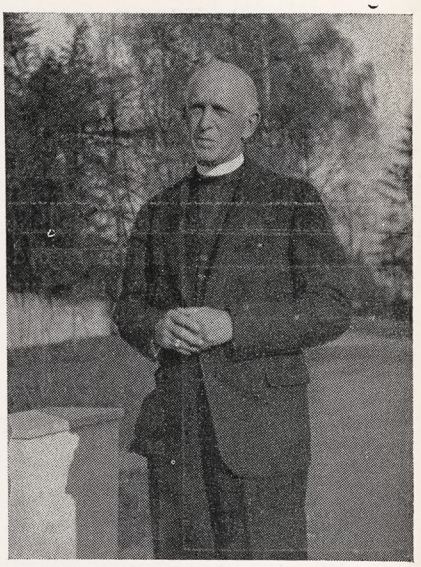
CONVENTION OF LOS ANGELES

Los Angeles:—Bishop Oldham of Albany and Bishop Quin of Texas were the guests of the convention of this diocese, meeting at St. Paul's Cathedral January 30-31. Besides addressing a joint meeting of the convention and the meeting of the Auxiliary, both speakers gave addresses at the dinner. A large part of the work of the convention was given to a revision of the constitution and canons of the diocese. Bishop Gooden pleaded for industrial understanding and goodwill.

SOUTHERNERS HIT FILIBUSTERS

Nashville: — "The time to permit filibusters in America has passed," declared 3600 Southerners who last week signed a petition to the U. S. Senate urging majority rule. "We Southern citizens, proud of the part played by Southerners in establishing these United States of America and in drafting its Constitution, declare that Senators engaging in filibuster flout not only the will of the Senate, but the best traditions of the South," says the petition, which will be presented to Senator Alben Barkley, majority leader, by the Southern Conference for Human Welfare. The petition includes signers from each of the thirteen Southern states, including over one hundred from Mississippi, home of filibusterers Bilbo and Eastland. The signers urge the Senate "after giving adequate opportunity for full discussion to halt any filibuster by invoking cloture, to maintain majority rule and preserve democracy."

HEADS PENSION FUND AFFILIATE



New York:—Clarence G. Michalis, New York banker, has been elected president of the Church Properties Fire Insurance Corp., an affiliate of the Church Pension Fund. A vestryman of the Church of the Heavenly Rest, Mr. Michalis was a deputy to the 1943 General Convention and a member of the budget committee.

COLD FIGURES ON WARM WORK

New York: — Capt. Earl Estabrook, national director of Church Army, at the annual meeting here, presented a few figures which will reveal the vast work of the organization to those having imagination—1,406 adult services were held, with an attendance of 36,973, while 1,765 junior services were attended by 36,518. There were 97 outdoor services attended by 4,361. Visits were made to 8,262 places taking a total of 4,388 hours, while 18,018 hours were spent by Army leaders in other work. Mr. Samuel Thorne, president of Church Army, presided at the meeting which was held at St. Bartholomew's.

HELEN WASHBURN IS DEAD

Philadelphia: — Helen C. Washburn, long associated with many agencies of the diocese of Pennsylvania, died on January 30th after a long illness. For more than thirty years she was active in religious education, having served as director of religious education at Christ Church, where her father was rector for many years; as a member of the department of religious education of the diocese and at one time a member of the same department of the National Council. She was also a member of the governing board of the summer conference of the province of Washington. Also from the founding in 1919 she was a member of the CLID.

Bishop J. I. Blair Larned, in charge of the American Churches in Europe, visits headquarters of the World Council of Churches in Geneva. The snapshot was taken by M. Robert Root, a secretary of the Council

ALL PAID IN FULL

New York:—Treasurer Lewis B. Franklin reports that 1945 was another fine year for the collection of funds for the national work of the Church. Expectations were $1,859,012 and payments amounted to $1,883,804 — an over payment of $24,792. Typical of treasurers he ends his note of "thank you" with the statement that "The needs of 1946 are greater than those of 1945."

Religious Educators Meeting This Week at Columbus

Due to National Council Meeting Leaders Of Episcopal Church Are Unable to Attend

By W. B. Spofford

Columbus, O.:—Hundreds of leaders of religious education are meeting this week in this city for a great conference sponsored by the International Council of Religious Education, an inter-church agency. It opened on Sunday the 10th with a meeting on world order when the address was given by Harold E. Stassen, president of the organization, and former governor of Minnesota. The presiding officer was Congressman Ralph W. Gwinn at this opening meeting held at the King Avenue Methodist Church. The following evening at a meeting in the Central High School Auditorium, Dean Luther A. Weigle of Yale Divinity School presented the first copy of the revised standard version of the New Testament, on sale that day for the first time in book shops, to Mr. Stassen. The meeting was preceded by a colorful procession which included choirs of local churches, officers of the Council, Biblical scholars and many state and local church pastors and officers.

Editor Boyd

Another highlight of the conference will be a dinner tomorrow evening, February 15, when a number of speakers will pay tribute to the Rev. Roy G. Ross in recognition of his ten years of service as the general secretary of the Council.

To list the subjects being dealt with at the many conferences and meetings held throughout the week would be impossible, but it can be said that they cover almost every conceivable subject, from the atomic bomb to pre-natal care of children; and from "how to have a good time" to "techniques for the revolution" —all subjects of course being closely tied-in with some phase of that cover-all, "Religious Education."

The fact that there are exactly 250 leaders in the field of religious education, from practically every denomination and every state, plus Canada, giving lectures during the week is perhaps another way of giving you an idea of the extent of this undertaking. In going through the list of 250 leaders one is struck by the absence of Episcopalians. There are but two on the program, the Rev. Beverly M. Boyd, a Witness editor, who is there as the head of the department of social service of the Federal Council of Churches rather than because he is an Episcopalian, and Layman Clark Kuebler, president of Ripon College, likewise present because he is a college president rather than because he is an Episcopalian.

Inquiry as to the reason for the absence of our leaders brought the following explanation from the Rev. Daniel McGregor, head of the National Council's department of religious education: "We cooperate closely with the International Council and I serve on several committees, as does also Vernon McMaster, Frances Young and Charlotte Tompkins of our staff here. But this Columbus conference comes the same week as the meeting of our National Council and so it was impossible for our officers to be away from headquarters. As for diocesan and parish religious education units, they never have been very closely identified with, or interested in, the International Council."

It certainly can be said that the conference is dominated, at least as far as lecturers are concerned, by Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists, Lutherans and secretaries of state and local federations of churches. The Federal Council of Churches, with which the Episcopal Church is affiliated, also was well represented at the conference by Mr. Boyd, Cameron Hall, F. Ernest Johnson, Jesse M. Bader, H. Paul Douglass, Paul G. Macy.

ELIZABETH FRAZIER RESIGNS

Philadelphia: — Miss Elizabeth Frazier, administrative secretary of the department of religious education of the diocese of Pennsylvania, has resigned effective March 1. Miss Beryl M. Newman, who has been the assistant, succeeds to the office. Miss Frazier, who has held the position for over thirteen years, does not plan to take up new work before fall.

ALABAMA URGES UNITY

Montgomery, Ala.: — Action to bring about unity with the Presbyterian Church was urged by a resolution passed at the convention of Alabama, meeting here at the Church of the Ascension, January 29-31. The convention also passed a resolution asking that aid should be given to all starving and homeless people, whether friend or foe, and urged that military, governmental and civic agencies cooperate to that end.

Roy G. Ross, honored this week for ten years of service as general secretary of the International Council of Religious Education

Bishop Carpenter in his convention address stated that the work of world reformation must begin in the family and called for "a renewed emphasis upon family prayer as an essential in training all members of the family for their responsibilities as world citizens."

Also addressing the convention was the Rev. Horace W. B. Donegan, rector of St. James', New York, who spoke on behalf of the Reconstruction and Advance Fund.

ham; Pierce N. McDonald, Montgomery; Randolph R. Claiborne, Huntsville; William H. Marmion, Birmingham. Laity: Algernon Blair, Montgomery; Oscar M. Kilby, Anniston; M. M. Baldwin, Birmingham; R. J. Williams, Birmingham.

LEADS CONFERENCE ON MUSIC

Richmond, Va.:—The Rev. Arthur W. Farlander, rector at Santa Rosa, Calif., a member of the commission on the hymnal, is to lead a conference on Church music at St. Paul's here on February 19th. The conference is sponsored by the diocesan commission on Church music with Mr. Farlander giving as its purpose: to introduce the New Hymnal; to bring people together to enjoy singing the hymns of the Church; to set forth to others who may be present the real contribution which our Church can make to sister communions.

A. W. Farlander

MANY TRIBUTES TO BRADFORD LOCKE

New York: — Many tributes have been paid to Bradford B. Locke, executive head of the Church Pension Fund, whose untimely death on January 6 was announced in The Witness of January 10. Bishop Gardner of New Jersey at the many meetings in the diocese on behalf of the Reconstruction and Advance Fund has spoken of the great loss to the diocese where he served on many committees. The parish where he served as a vestryman, Trinity, Princeton, also passed a memorial minute on the loss suffered by the parish. Also at the meeting of the executive committee of the Church Pension Fund, which he served in various positions from 1917 until his death, paid tribute to him for his unique service to the Church through his long association to the Fund and its affiliates.

PROTESTANTISM FACES A CRISIS

New York:—Protestantism, "split into hundreds of denominations whose differences have no relevance to any important problem in the world, faces the greatest crisis in human history," Harry Emerson Fosdick, minister of the Riverside Church, said at the second annual dinner of the Protestant Council.

"Frustrated, baffled and dreadfully ineffectual," Protestantism must reverse its whole policy, Dr. Fosdick said. "A new era has dawned," he said, and "we must stress our unities, not our differences."

Dr. Fosdick stressed the need for "togetherness" rather than "separateness," first, among "all the great religions of the world"; second, "between Catholics, Jews and Protestants," and, third, "where our special interest lies tonight—within Protestantism itself."

"Unless we get together, all of us—Catholics, Jews and Protestants—are going to lose one of the most critical spiritual and moral battles in our nation's history," he said, and urged that the country's three major religions prepare for use in public schools a book, "presenting to American youth the great spiritual heritage of our Western world, not as propaganda but as basic knowledge."

National planning to avert a recurrence of the financial and social disasters of the depression years was advocated by Methodist Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam in a speech at the dinner. He stressed that only by national planning can full employment be achieved. Those who think full employment impossible are fostering a revolution, he declared.

"The sorry spectacle of idle machines, unemployed men and unused materials present in one place at the same time does not make sense," he continued.

PADDOCK LECTURES AT GENERAL

New York:—The Rev. Cuthbert A. Simpson, professor of Old Testament, is delivering the Paddock Lectures this year at the General Seminary on Revelation and Response in the Old Testament. There are six lectures, starting on February 18th.

UNITY SUPPORTED BY PARISH

Newton Lower Falls, Mass.:—St. Mary's parish here, at its annual meeting, went on record as favoring unity with the Presbyterian Church. With but one dissenting vote the resolution states that "this union is desirable and should be consummated with appropriate promptness." By a vote of 20 to 9, with a number not voting, the parish urged General Convention "to take no action to alter the Book of Common Prayer (marriage service) nor to change canon law so as to be inconsistent therewith, not to permit the remarriage of divorced persons within this Church in any such way as to controvert this permanence."

UNMARRIED WOMEN HAVE HOME

Washington: — The diocese of Washington has opened the House of Mercy to serve "war casualties" among young, unmarried women. Formerly given over to the training of unmarried mothers from Maryland and Virginia and to caring for their children, the House of Mercy now is devoting most of its resources to giving a temporary home to unmarried expectant mothers who have no other refuge and need help until after their babies are born.

Will W. Alexander, director of race relations of the Julius Rosenwald Fund, who is one of the outstanding speakers at the conference on religious education

During the period the House of Mercy was closed, various committees conducted a survey of similar institutions throughout the nation to determine the most successful procedures in helping the girls get a new start in life. Consultations were held with representatives of Travelers' Aid and the Board of Public Welfare and the home service division of the American Red Cross.

Deaconess Frances B. Affleck, known in Church circles for supervising the revitalization of similar church agencies in St. Louis, Des Moines, and Utica, N. Y., has accepted the temporary post of superintendent.

The Old Straw Man

IN THE January Atlantic Monthly, Bernard Iddings Bell writes on a familiar theme, What About Church Unity? He is of the opinion that the real divisions of Christianity today are not, as commonly assumed, those between Catholicism and Protestantism, or between the many sects and denominations. For all their differences, the many branches of the Church have always been in general agreement about the essential doctrines of the Christian faith. They have been together in accepting the Biblical view of God and man and redemption through Christ, the God-Man.

The real division today, says Dr. Bell, is between historic Christianity and "neo-Christianity," between traditional Christianity and liberal Christianity. He sums up the historic or traditional point of view admirably. It is the orthodox statement of the faith. It is the faith of the Book of Common Prayer. Here is no sentimental optimism about human nature. Here is the unflinching realism of the Bible: that man is a sinner whose self-centeredness corrupts and perverts whatever he says and does. Education and science only make him prouder and more dangerous to live with. He can not save himself: the struggle with self only leads to more introspection and self-centeredness. Consequently there is strife and conflict and war everywhere in the world. Historic Christianity insists that salvation is from God who so loves the world that he "came down from heaven" and "was in Christ reconciling the world to himself." That is to say, we are promised salvation from sin or deliverance from selfishness by accepting what God has done for us in Christ. Acceptance here means, of course, trust in and commitment to Christ who has proved his effectiveness to redeem human life through the centuries.

So much for historic Christianity whose central convictions Dr. Bell summarizes so well. Then he goes on to a like summary of what he chooses to call "liberal" Christianity. Although he doesn't use the expression, he defines this as a kind of ethical culture. It is flattering and optimistic about human nature even without God. It waters down and departs from the ancient creeds, reducing Christ to a good man. It lacks the depths of the faith of the early fathers, the mediaeval saints and the reformers. It makes Christianity hardly more than philanthropy and good will. It exalts the Sermon on the Mount and forgets the prologue to the Fourth Gospel and the epistles of St. Paul. We are paraphrasing Dr. Bell's argument here, but one wonders if he has heard about the theological and ecclesiastical movement to the right within Protestantism the last few decades. Has he read Niebuhr's, The Nature and Destiny of Man? The "liberal" Protestantism of which he writes is in the past tense. We thought it had long since been dead and buried.

But what is most disturbing and deceptive about Dr. Bell's essay are his remarks about the Episcopal Church. After thus defining "historic" and "liberal" Christianity, he hastens to imply that the Anglo-Catholic party is the defender of the former within our communion, while the Liberal Evangelical group is representative of the diluted, humanistic, secularized Christianity he describes as "neo-Christianity."

This, we say, is utterly misleading and false. Where has Dr. Bell gotten his information? What bishops and priests of the Church are humanists theologically speaking? Since when have Evangelical Churchmen stopped using and believing in the religion of the Book of Common Prayer? By and large, we maintain, they are wholeheartedly committed to the statements of the faith in the creeds and sacraments and offices of the Church. They have no quarrel with tradition: they honor and cherish it, including that of the reformers, but they are not fundamentalists about it. Indeed, the evangelical emphasis of the Church is toward preserving the purification of the historic faith achieved during the Reformation, a purification which restored freedom and got back to the heart of Christianity. The evangelical doctrine of justification by faith has more tradition behind it than a particular way of saying Mass which seems so important to some of our brethren. That doctrine assumes the historic Christian view of man and his need of and answer in Christ.

Dr. Bell, evangelical Churchmen love the Church and believe in the ancient faith. We are one with you there. You are wrong to imply otherwise. Our

"QUOTES"

I BELIEVE that the world as well as the individual is the subject of redemption. I believe it is the divine will not only that the heart of the individual be purified but that the social order be improved. I believe in the Kingdom of God both here and hereafter. I believe the coming of the Kingdom is the gift of God and that it should also be the supreme goal of human striving.

difference with you is one of a larger appreciation of our Protestant heritage and neighbors. It is one of emphasis on modes of worship. We acknowledge the centrality of the Holy Communion in Christian worship, but we can not agree that it is "the Mass that matters." Furthermore, we are not prepared to drop Morning Prayer and sermon altogether. It has a missionary value in this age of churchless men and women. And finally our difference is one of spirit. We are wary of the attitude of assurance that we alone are right which seems to prevail among Christians that look to Rome. These are important differences, but they do not relate to the bed-rock convictions of historic Christianity. We remain one fellowship and communion there, and shall always so remain, pray God.

Open the Gates

WENDELL WILLKIE once spoke of the "reservoir of good-will" which this country possesses for the world. A large potential is still stored up—waiting for someone to open the gates. Charitable organizations and the UNRRA have released a part of it—but it is a mere trickle when one considers the resources of this country. Most Americans have generous impulses, but they often await a dramatic stimulus. One of the most sensible suggestions we have heard of comes from Dr. Alvin Johnson, former director of the New York School for Social Research. He writes to the New York Times that for each person in the United States "there is one European or Asiatic who is suffering hunger and cold and, worst of all, despair." From our abundance we can easily relieve their need if we find the financial means. And so he proposes that Congress authorize a "Humanity Loan, every dollar of which shall be assigned to UNRRA, to do the job of relief and rehabilitation in a style worthy of the United States. . . . Give us a chance at a Humanity Loan! You will see every minister, priest and rabbi eager to serve as a bond salesman; you will see even the most cynical solid citizens responding to an impulse that would vitalize our moral and religious life as it was not vitalized even by a holy war."

Yes; "in a style worthy of the United States!" We agree that the response would be overwhelming, and we are sure the results would be even more profitable to our souls' health here than they would be to the recipients of its benefits. And let the gates open wide—wherever there is need.

Set-Up at Headquarters

THE first of our series on General Convention Issues will deal with the set-up at National headquarters (281) and what the writer, the Rev. Harry Longley, rector of St. John's, Charleston, W. Va., thinks the Convention should do about it. This will be in our issue of February 28, thus enabling rectors who want to use the series with discussion groups to have copies the first week in Lent. This will be followed by an Open Letter to Episcopalians by Henry Pitney Van Dusen, president of Union Seminary and a Presbyterian. Others to contribute to the series are the Rev. Herbert W. Prince, rector at Lake Forest; Bishop Stephen Keeler of Minnesota; the Rev. Theodore O. Wedel, warden of the College of Preachers; Bishop Edward L. Parsons, retired Bishop of California; Mrs. Henry Hill Pierce of New York; Dean John W Suter of Washington Cathedral; Bishop William Scarlett of Missouri; Dr. Stringfellow Barr, president of St. John's College; Mr. Spencer Miller Jr., formerly consultant on industrial relations of the National Council and now highway commissioner of New Jersey; Bishop Noble Powell of Maryland.

It is our judgment, having already read several of the articles, that they will be widely read and discussed. It is necessary for us to announce therefore that copies of any one issue cannot be secured after the date of issue . . . paper shortage prevents us from printing extra copies to meet any such demand. So we ask that you please send your orders at once, particularly those who plan to use the series with Lenten discussion groups. Orders received after February 23 will have to start with our issue of March 7th which will feature the article by Dr. Van Dusen.

Strategy for Home Missions

By
HERMANN N. MORSE
Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of National Missions

THE urgency of the present situation for the Church and for the missionary enterprise chiefly arises from the fact that the world has taken more seriously than we ourselves have the basic implications of Christian truth for the life of the common man. Christianity is the hope of the dispossessed and not, as we have so often sought to make it, the bulwark of the privileged

Two broad principles seem to provide the key to the needed strategy for Protestant home missions today. The first of these concerns our imperative need to demonstrate our belief that the Christian gospel is the one socially unifying force, over and above all racial or social or cultural cleavages, that can unify the society of our day. The greatest need in the world today is unity on the basis of a common faith and a common brotherhood. For us in the enterprise of home missions this involves three closely related emphases which I will describe as equality of religious opportunity, equality in social and community standards, and equality in spiritual fellowship. The first concerns our task in evangelization, the second our task in Christian service, and the third our practice of Christian discipleship.

The Church is still trying to approach the milling mass of the unchurched on a highly selective and individualized constituency basis. Our habit of identifying particular churches not with the community as a whole, but only with selective elements in it not only makes the Church unwittingly a participant in group conflict rather than a solvent of it, but also shatters the continuity of our religious appeal in every changing community and at the same time makes community integration more difficult. The Church gives the community a striking example of selective disunity supported by allegedly spiritual sanctions.

TO EVANGELIZE America today, we must approach it not on the basis of a selective appeal to separate groups or individuals, but on the basis of the community as a whole. . . . The time is coming and now is that the parish approach is the only answer to any evangelistic problem. This for two reasons: First, unless we anchor the idea of evangelism to the parish and the idea of the parish to the community, the total influence of the Protestant Church will be increasingly weakened. Second, this approach is the only one that avoids a tragic hiatus between faith and life.

Society, for its own preservation, will not long tolerate the continuation for many of unequal opportunites for health, education and the other basic necessities. Home missions has an honorable history of service to such needs. There is still need for its direct ministry to many groups and communities. There is even greater need for forthright leadership to correct basic inequalities. The two things . . . ministry in particular situations and an unequivocal influence on behalf of the rights of all . . . can no longer be kept distinct.

I think we have convinced ourselves that the great tasks we have been discussing are not only common responsibilities, but are necessarily corporate in nature, in the sense that they are utterly beyond the capacity of the individual congregation or denomination, however strong, and that they are all inextricably embedded in the structure of the community and in the corporate life of society.

There is not too much time left to us to demonstrate within the life of the Church that we have a faith that can bring us to unity in Jesus Christ and that we can offer to the world to unite all men in brotherhood. This is our ministry to our own land and to the world: to undergird with a unifying Christian faith; to inspire with Christian hope; to strengthen in Christian service; to knit together in Christian fellowship, and, beyond any bounds of selfish interest to see our nation as a potent force for a Christian world.

The Age of Atomic Power

by Kirtley F. Mather

Professor of Geology at Harvard

ON JULY 16, 1945, civilization crossed the threshold of a new age. Only a few persons knew it at the time. They were the scientists, engineers and army men who saw the blinding flash of the explosion of the first atomic bomb at the testing station in the desert near Los Alamos, New Mexico. Less than a month later, all the world had been informed. Hiroshima and Nagasaki were virtually annihilated and Japan had precipitously surrendered to the victorious Allies. Since then most of us have been trying to comprehend the meaning of this peerless achievement of modern science, to appraise its terrifying potentialities for the future of the human family, to discover what changes it may bring in our own lives and in the life of our nation.

From the official reports of the War Department, the carefully worded resolutions of the several newly organized associations of scientists, the pronouncements of the experts in nuclear physics and the speeches of the politicians, several supremely important ideas are now clear. Only when they are generally recognized by those responsible for the formulation of public opinion can there be any justifiable hope that this latest achievement of the human intellect will prove a blessing rather than a curse to all mankind.

Never before has there been such a dramatic and arresting demonstration of the validity of the scientific method for ascertaining truths and utilizing natural resources. Measured by any criteria that might be applied, the project that has been secretly under way since 1940 and has culminated in the production of at least three atomic bombs is the most stupendous achievement in all the annals of research and technology. It represents the ultimate in both organization and cooperation, in practical application of abstract theory, and in the use of scientific methods of observation and experiment. Grave indeed is now the danger that the general public will be forever confident that there is absolutely nothing impossible for "science" to achieve. As a matter of fact, I'm somewhat tempted to think so myself.

In a vague sort of way, almost everyone appreciates the fact that atomic energy is something new, but I doubt whether very many people appreciate its utter novelty. Until December, 1942, when the first uranium pile began to generate energy, all the work of the world had been done by means of power that was either electronic, radiational or gravitational in nature. Chemical reactions that liberate energy, whether they involve the combustion of coal or oil or the explosion of dynamite or TNT, result from interplay of electrons in the relatively large spaces inside atoms but outside atomic nuclei. They yield amounts of energy measuring only a few electron-volts. Nuclear fission, the source of the power that explodes an atomic bomb, yields several score of millions of electron-volts. The power that science placed in human hands in the summer of 1945 is of an entirely different order of magnitude from anything that has ever before been known.

WHAT will men do with this new power? That indeed is the $64.00 question. Almost as novel as the bomb itself, is the astonishing unanimity of the several hundred scientists in the United States who are competent to speak of that question. With one accord they tell us that there can be no adequate military defense for us or anyone else against death and destruction from atomic explosions and the product of nuclear fission. Nor is there anything that we can do to prevent any one of a dozen nations from achieving within a few years the ability to do to us what we have demonstrated we can do to them, if they set their scientists and engineers to the task. The facts of life in an interdependent world have long been apparent to a very few extraordinarily wise and intelligently benevolent individuals, the prophets and seers of many times and places; they are now being driven home to everybody with explosive violence and glazing clarity from which no man can hide.

We had been thinking that interdependence meant the necessity of acquiring raw materials from Malaya and Bolivia, from Indo-China and Czechoslovakia, of selling sewing machines and typewriters in Belgium and Brazil, in China and Turkestan. We now know that the future peace and security of America depend upon the intelligence and good will of the governments and people of foreign lands, as well as upon our own wisdom and good intentions.

Although there is no way whereby knowledge can be imprisoned within national boundary lines or confined within barriers patrolled by armed guards, there is a way to control the manufacture of implements of destruction based upon the use of energy derived from nuclear fission. If an effective international control of certain strategic raw materials is established and if an appropriate international commission has the specific authority to investigate the progress of nuclear research and the use of those materials within all nations, no group of men anywhere on earth could manufacture atomic weapons in secret.

Presumably, in the present state of world affairs, the Security Council of the United Nations Organization is the most appropriate body now available to undertake this responsibility. For America to take the lead in planning such arrangements will make clear to the world that we have faith in our allies, that we believe we can trust them, and that we firmly intend to cooperate with them in achieving a peaceful and prosperous world. No attempt should be made to prevent the spread of knowledge concerning the scientific principles or technologic processes pertaining to the use of atomic energy. Further research should be stimulated, not handicapped. Only thus may the full potentialities of this new source of power be developed for the welfare of mankind.

"As An Ancient Apocalyptist Might Have Described It"

I BEHELD, and lo, a great blond beast arose out of the earth, and its teeth were like the teeth of a wild boar, wherewith to tear in pieces the bodies of men; and upon its head were the horns of a wild ox, and its arms bare the seal of a cross with sharp hooks, wherewith it should card the flesh of men. And the nations trembled with fear at the sound of the armies of this beast; and it trampled down many strongholds and cities in its raging fury. And one came on the clouds of heaven, crying, "Peace in our time;" but he bare his shield folded beneath his arm, and he said only, "Let the nations buy and sell; let the brave submit to tyranny; and let no one disturb the beast to annoy him or provoke him to wrath." And they that sat within their strong walls feared lest the beast and his armies should triumph. And after many days the beast brake down their wall wherein they trusted, and drave all before him, even to the shores of the sea. Then the God of heaven sent down a cloud and covered them, and men fled in ships to their own country. And I beheld as it were a swarm of locusts, innumerable, which the beast put forth to devour the land of the North; but a great multitude of birds appeared, and destroyed those locusts. Yet they hurt the cities where they fell, and their destruction was by few. In the night-visions I saw, and behold, another great beast rose out of the sea, and he grew greater and mightier as he drew near. And he stood upon the shore of the sea, and his armies were innumerable. Then came a great bear out of the East, and the nations rejoiced, that the great bear from the East and the strong one from the West were sworn to destroy that first beast. And they fought valiantly, and prevailed, and the name of the first beast was found no more on the earth.

America should promptly announce its intention to open its laboratories and factories to inspection by authorized agents of the controlling international body and to encourage its scientists to work in cooperation with the scientists of all other countries that are willing to do the same. Above all, every decision of our government regarding atomic energy must be carefully designed to increase good will among nations, rather than to nourish suspicion, jealousy and animosity. Never should we forget the facts of life in an interdependent world in which science has at last given men the ability to commit collective suicide.

New Books

Excellent Good *Fair

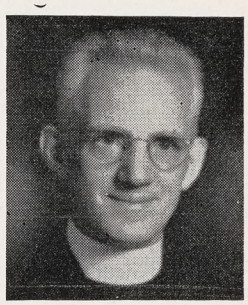
A History of Rome to 565 A.D.* By Arthur E. R. Boak. Macmillan, $4.50.

Gone are the days when a History of Rome could end with the accession of Augustus, the establishment of the empire, or after a brief chapter on the "early emperors." That was as bad as ending Greek History with the conquest of the East by Alexander. In Professor Boak's History of Rome, the story is carried down to the death of Justinian —a good stopping point, though of course even then the history of Rome did not end. This is one of the books the ordinary reader ought to get hold of—not some kindergarten simplification of history, with cartoons for illustrations, but honest, thorough, thought-out historical writing. If we are to understand our present world, it is most important that we should take into account its past. And the history of Rome has much to teach us. Our American Republic is, even in form, akin to the Roman: two legislative houses, a Senate and a Popular Assembly; an elected leader who is commander in chief of army and navy; and so on. But the parallels are closer: the rise of the powerful equestrian group (they were not an order of chivalrous knights, but a ruthless, money-hungry class of business adventurers)—this is parallel to what we have seen since the 80's here in America; so is the rise of popular demagogues, leading insatiable groups of men who knew what they wanted and were determined to get it, at whatever cost to the nation as a whole. What happens to a nation where these powers emerge and clash? Read Roman history—read Professor Boak!



One great value in this work is that the new edition takes full advantage of the magnificent Cambridge Ancient History, completed just before the war broke out, and also of the late Professor Tenney Frank's Economic Survey of Rome, where all the available data are catalogued and interpreted. On the religious side, i.e. the history of Roman religion, the facts are there, and accurately stated in accordance with the generally accepted views of historians of religion (though the most recent views are not discussed: you could hardly expect this in a textbook of general history); so are the facts about the rise of Christianity, which are very cautiously stated, so cautiously in fact that it is difficult to see why Christianity spread and eventually took over the whole field. But no one book can say everything, and a textbook implies a teacher to supplement and in some cases to interpret. It is a very good textbook, as most teachers will no doubt agree; and it is also a good book for the general reader who wishes to bring himself up to date and who likes clear, accurate, reliable history.

For Church School Teachers

By
WILLIAM GRIME

RECENTLY I was asked by a church school committee to state briefly some of my ideas on worship and I began by reminding them that the notion persists with too many parents that worship begins when the church bell stops ringing and the choir and rector enter the chancel. The truth is worship starts with a call from God. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind." Then while fulfilling this commandment we should see God has all humanity upon his heart and thus be actuated to carry out his other commandment to love all his children as ourselves. Furthermore, God's call would be in vain had he not endowed us with the capacity to respond to him. Without this given capacity to yield to the impact of his spirit, we would still be as rocks and the beasts of the field. And since these truths have become obscure in the minds of parents, we shall have to aim to recover for them the priority of God, else worship will continue to degenerate into subjectivism, optionalism and sure confusion for their children. But how shall we rediscover this prerequisite for fruitful worship? We must constantly seek through every resource we have, in cooperation with God the Holy Spirit, to awaken reappreciation of these mighty gifts of God and then to guide this bestowed capability for response to the divine to know him, to meet him and to work with him as supremely disclosed in Jesus Christ.

Parents must come to know God as their father-creator and thus see themselves as his created beings. "A trite saying" says someone. Yes, but we had better not let parents forget it again unless we want another wave of false humanism and secularism. We must keep it clearer from now on, that men and women are derived beings from their creator, for it is the truth of their eternal kinship with God that gives them their inherent dignity, liberty and responsibility.

Then parents must be made ready to meet God, in nature, the Bible, the judgments of history, the sacraments, the liturgies, the fellowships of the Church and home, in so-called secular associations, in the world's great unfinished causes, etc. But above all, they must be nurtured into finding God fully disclosed in Christ as their Saviour. Let them kneel at the foot of the cross as they come for prayer and the "bread of heaven," alert as to what the unfailing love does to rescue men from the pits of personal and special wickedness, in spite of the fact that they take his earth and all that therein is and make a shambles of it; let them come to see they are held with a love that will not let them go, a love which makes all roads away from him turn out to be detours back to him; let them see his offer of reconciliation is an indispensible necessity for their sound growth as persons and this should issue in healing penitence and glad evangelism for the everlasting mercy.

Moreover all this must stir parents to work with God, through his new kingdom, the Church. The test of meeting God as creator, redeemer and friend lies in the surrender of our wills to the doing of his will. And this striving to establish right relationships with God and man naturally leads to the facing of the challenge in "Our Father." Since all men are God's children, individuals, who make up the social nature of the redeemed community, cannot but work together, as an integral part of their worship, to make Christian community come true for all men. Of course there are "lions in the way," the lions of religious inertia, economic injustice and political unbrotherliness. But the liberating forces in Christian worship are not given merely for individual redemption but to keep us restless until we come to grips with life's evil resistences bringing them more and more under the transforming grace of God. It is hypocrisy in any of us to go on saying "Our Father" unless we are also saying through Christlike spirit and action "our brothers on the earth are our unavoidable concern."

Then again these foundational truths must be brought into children's and young people's worship experiences in church and classroom. And these realities must not be presented to them as just Sunday school children but as members of the family of God. Of course this basic training must be presented to them in terms they can understand, in undertakings which recognize their now-needs and age levels, in democratic adventures with specific life situations. and in simple, brief, varied prayer services in which their parents join whenever possible. Let us be done with this silliness as to which is the more important or as to what should come first, the concept of God or activity in the worship of God. Each is equally necessary to the task of developing Christian persons. Let us be more concerned with getting our children to see, especially our older ones, that worship is not a take-it-or-leave-it experience. Inevitably everyone worships some God or gods. And if we want to know the real God or gods a person is worshipping, all we have to do is to examine what desires and actions are controlling his life. Youth in the kingdoms of our enemies worshipped desperately race, blood, stateism, conquest. Their leader's great slogan was "the impossible is possible." We know now where this modern idolatry comes out. And we must not let this tragic testimony of false worship end in them with a shudder or with selfrighteousness but we must continue their basic training in worship until they choose again and again to dethrone the false gods in their own lives and communities, for good decisions do not last without renewal.

So our task is to win parents, teachers and children to worship God in Christ until his values and purposes become their dominant interests. Let us seek to ground them not simply in Christian ethics. That is nothing but cut-flower religion. Rather let us ground them in a given growing fellowship with the Christ-like God—to know him, to meet with him and to work with him. This should encourage the discerning of the true origin and possibilities of themselves and their brethren and promote the best possible kind of participation in the worshipping community, the Church of God.

Convention of 1949 Invited To San Francisco

The Convention of California Also Takes Action on the Marriage and Divorce Canon

Edited by Sara Dill

San Francisco:—California is to invite the General Convention of 1949 to meet in this city. The 1946 Convention was to have met here but a change was made because of difficulties in travel.

Warning churchmen that we have only begun to fight in the struggle for a better world Bishop Block, addressing the convention of California, said international peace is threatened because "the evil spirits of isolationism and cynicism, which during the shooting war remained in abashed silence, have again become vocal and are challenging the hope of world fellowship and imperilling the payment of a debt we owe to those who have given their lives that liberty and justice might not perish from our earth." In the domestic field "some of the evils we hoped had been destroyed in the crucible of war, now reappear with aggravated malignity. As a nation we are morally at peace with gambling on a fantastic scale and the problem of drink is becoming ever more formidable. This is not the musing of a misanthrope. America needs a spiritual revival, else our churchly activities are irrelevancies in the current scheme of things, and we will dip into a period of decadence resembling that which followed the first world war."

Significant action was taken by the convention when the report of the diocesan commission on marriage, under the chairmanship of Dean Henry H. Shires, was presented and approved by a vote of 89 to 17. The report of the commission indicated that the Church is at the crossroads regarding its attitude toward marriage. The present confused situation is intolerable. Either the Church must say that no marriage of divorced persons will be tolerated or we must provide a practicable method of dealing with each case on its merits. Accordingly, the report recommends a canon providing that any person whose marriage contract has been civilly terminated by decree of annulment or by final decree of divorce for any cause may apply to the bishop of his or her domicile for his judgment as to whether applicant is free to marry in the Church. Under this proposed canon all such applications shall be in writing, addressed to the bishop through the minister of the parish who shall certify to certain facts and circumstances, particularly those which would determine whether a former marriage failed to be the spiritual union taught by Christ, causing either the existence of certain impediments or the existence of abnormalities, defects, or deficiencies of character sufficient to prevent the fulfillment of the marriage vows. Furthermore, whether in the former marriage there existed irremediable mental, moral, or spiritual deterioration or incapacity, the causes or existences of which were latent before the previous contract and which were exposed by the marital relationship. On the basis of these facts and within the limits of a strict legal procedure, the bishop after taking advice thereon shall render judgment in writing to the petitioner. After prolonged discussion it was resolved: 1. that the convention of the diocese of California adopts this report as representing in substance the mind of the convention regarding the canons of the church which deal with matters considered herein; 2. that copies of this report be furnished to members of the joint commission on holy matrimony of the General Convention, and to all of the bishops of the Church.

Throughout the convention there was a major emphasis upon the Missionary Program of the Church and the crucial importance of the Reconstruction and Advance Program. Bishop Arthur B. Kinsolving II, highlighted this emphasis. He indicated that Reconstruction and Advance must begin in the hearts of the clergy and the people of the Church. We must grapple with the powers of paganism in our own parishes and communities. When we have honestly faced this issue our mission to the uttermost parts of the earth will be effective.

General Convention Deputies: Clergy: John C. Leffler, Francis P. Foote, Russell B. Staines, Mark Rifenbark; Laity: Clifton Kroll, H. Robert Braden, Albert C. Agnew, and Arthur W. Towne; Alternates: Clergy: Oscar F. Green, Henry H. Shires, John M. Krumm, V. O. Ward; Laity: Nelson Hackett, Robert Bullard, Noel Arnold, and Philip Adams.

Gifts from Franco

Madrid (wireless to RNS):—General Franco has made a gift to Spain's three new cardinals of the robes with which they will be invested at the consistory in Rome on February 18, it was learned here. The Spanish government is also providing a plane for the Cardinals' trip to Rome. The party accompanying the cardinals will include leading members of the foreign ministry and two canonists who are going to Rome to conclude new church-state agreements prepared in Madrid by the Minister of Foreign Affairs and the Papal Nuncio to Spain, Msgr. Gaetano Cicognani.

UNO Service

London (wireless to RNS):—Delegates to the United Nations General Assembly, members of both Houses of Parliament as well as dominion representatives attended an intercession service for the work of the United Nations at St. Paul's Cathedral here. The lesson was read by British Prime Minister Clement Atlee. In his sermon, the Bishop of London, the Rt. Rev. J. W. C. Wand, declared that Christians were the last people who should look down from superior heights on the struggles of statesmen and politicians trying to achieve unity. However, he said, there was an essential unity in the Church which would once again find expression. Best opportunity to develop this unity among nations, the bishop said, was through practice of the Christian principles of love and goodwill. He hoped, he continued, that the United Nations would develop such coordination between themselves that it would serve not only the individual nations but all mankind.

Columbus Preachers

Columbus, O.: — Trinity Church here has a notable group of special preachers during Lent, leading off with Dean Sidney Sweet of Christ Church Cathedral, St. Louis. Others in order, most of them speaking from Monday through Friday: Boynton Merrill, Congregationalist of this city; Louis W. Pitt of New York; Thomas Barrett of New York; Meridith B. Wood of Hoosack School; Robert Y. Condit of Hollis, N. Y.; James M. Lichliter of Webster Groves, Mo.; Ganse Little, Presbyterian of Columbus. The rector, the Rev. Robert W. Fay, will take the Good Friday devotions.

Progressive Action

Columbus, O. (RNS):—The Ohio Pastors Conference, one of the largest annual meetings of clergy, gave unanimous endorsement to the Fair Employment Practices Bill and condemned the Senate filibuster. The pastors also supported the Wagner housing bill; called for treaty agreements between the Big Five to eliminate military training; approved world control of the atomic bomb.

Rumson, N. J.: — When the Rev. H. Fairfield Butt went off to the wars a couple of years ago to serve as a chaplain, the Rev. George A. Robertshaw was asked to serve as minister at St. George's, here. During the two years the church school enrollment nearly trebled; the missionary quota increased by 50%; because of increased activities an addition to the parish house was approved and $60,000 raised for it in two months' time. When Rector Butt returned on January 20 he paid a tribute to Mr. Robertshaw for doing such "a difficult but magnificent job."

Significant Books for LENT

I Beheld His Glory!

by 'Cornelius the Centurion'

Newsman of Galilee

This is the account of Jesus' last days on earth which created a sensation when it first appeared in the Chicago Tribune. It is the work of JOHN EVANS, Episcopal clergyman and dean of religious newspaper editors. He describes the events in Jerusalem during that Holy Week in the language of a modern newspaper reporter. Now put into book form, this great story will especially appeal at this Lenten season. $1.00

Christ the Lord

JOHN KNOX. The faith and life of the early church were centered about Jesus, and, as Dr. Knox points out, "the meaning of Jesus in the early church is nothing less than the whole meaning of the whole New Testament." A scholarly, reverent study of Jesus as he had meaning for the early Christians: how "He was remembered"; "He was known still"; "He was interpreted." $1.75

God In Us

A. CAMPBELL GARNETT. A professor of philosophy in the University of Wisconsin shows how the Christian faith in God, if rightly viewed, is in harmony with the truths of science and history. Dr. Garnett turns the spotlight on a great religious insight: "It is God that worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure." Nontechnical, clear, convincing. $1.50

Every Day a Prayer

MARGUERITTE BRO. Is widely popular because it is attuned to a realistic age, which calls not for a retreat from life but for an understanding of it, as it presents itself from day to day. Meditations, prayers, poems—for each day of the year. $1.50

300 Favorite Poems

THOS. CURTIS CLARK, compiler. The "handy book" of poems that the average reader understands and likes. From the master poets—and from many modern writers. $1.00

A Christian Global Strategy

WALTER W. VAN KIRK. Christian missions is not dead, but is it alert to the new challenge today brings? Missions must now operate on a world scale. Christianity must give up its five-and-ten-cent conceptions; it must embark, as a unified army, against world paganism. A plea to those who follow Jesus Christ. For only this great Leader can point the way out for a confused world—to a victory that means the coming of the Kingdom. $2.00

Stalin awards for scientific achievement this year. In civilian life he is Professor Valentin Felixovich Voino-Yasenecki, consultant surgeon to military hospitals in the Tambov section. Archbishop Luka received the Stalin award for new surgical methods in the treatment of suppurating diseases and wounds described in his two books, Outlines of Suppurative Surgery, completed in 1943, and Late Resections of Infected Firearm Wounds of Joints published in 1944. He is the only winner this year of a first-class award for medical research.

Unfair Competition

Vancouver, B. C. — Frederick Chubb, English-born organist in Christ Church Cathedral here, drew so many people to organ recitals that the Vancouver City Council was forced by amusement interests to call a halt. Overflow crowds made it necessary to set a nominal charge for admission to Chubb's Saturday night recitals of sacred music and amusement caterers asserted that as churches do not pay taxes in British Columbia, the competition was unfair.

Mr. Chubb, who has announced he will transfer his services next April to St. John's Church in Victoria, B. C., started his career as "apprentice church organist" in England. He went to Christ Church 35 years ago, and for 15 years his music has been broadcast from Vancouver.

Wants Cities Restored

Richmond, Va. (RNS):—A movement by the Richmond Ministerial Union to raise funds for the rebuilding of atom bombed Hiroshima and Nagasaki has received enthusiastic approval from ministers and laymen in many States throughout the union.

Letters from as far West as California, as far North as New York and as far South as Florida are pouring in to Dr. John A. MacLean, local Presbyterian minister who instigated the idea.

While many prominent persons, including several college presidents, have endorsed the plan, only three letters have been received opposing it, Dr. MacLean said.

One opposed the move on the ground that the soil beneath Hiroshima and Nagasaki is poisoned to a great depth by the bombs and hence will prove dangerous to future residents. The second opponent complained that other cities in Japan and China which are also seriously damaged were being "Neglected" for the sake of the two atom-bombed sites.

The third letter came from a soldier who was wounded by the Japanese. He wrote that he wanted to give to a fund "to make more atomic bombs to blow the rest of the Japs to Hell."

Chaplains for Vets

Philadelphia:—Properly qualified chaplains will be located in 35 university centers throughout the U. S. to minister to the special needs of veterans now studying in colleges and universities under a plan formulated here by the Presbyterian Church. The chaplains will be appointed through the committee on camp and Church activities in cooperation with the board of Christian education. In centers where there are many Presbyterian men, the chaplains will work in close cooperation with the Westminster Fellowship. The Church also plans to give refresher courses in its seminaries for returning service chaplains. Financial aid also will be made available to chaplains.

Labor Conferences

Albany, N. Y. (RNS): — Conferences between representatives of the church, labor, management and agriculture on current economic problems were recommended by the New York State Council of Churches at its annual meeting here. The Council also urged that parties to industrial disputes make "concessions to achieve concord and fair and full employment" when all the facts on both sides have been presented. The Council's social action commission plans to hold a series of conferences later this year between clergymen and representatives of labor unions and management.

Modern Gospel

London (wireless to RNS): — Churches must agree on a gospel for the modern world before they can hope to rouse the indifferent or convince antagonists, the Rev. Thomas Wigley, chairman of the Union of Modern Churchmen, declared here in a letter to the London Times. The letter criticized the recent report of the Archbishops of Canterbury and York entitled, "Toward the conversion of England."

"The first essential," Mr. Wigley wrote "is for religious people to come to agreement among themselves on what exactly their good news or gospel is for the modern world, for only then can they hope to arouse the indifferent and convince the antagonistic. At the recent Cambridge conference of the British Council of Churches, it was generally admitted that during the past 25 years the Churches had been backing the wrong movements. Such acknowledgment of past mistakes was hardly encouraging as a basis of appeal to laymen to be the new evangelists. The denunciation of humanism as an agelong lie in the 'Conversion of England' report is another expression of the feeling of guilt among Church leaders all too anxious to find a scapegoat for their own shortcomings. Along this neurotic line we shall find neither health nor healing.

"Our world greatly needs a faith which is as rational as it is religious, and there is a need on all sides for a cleansing of the mind as well as the heart, if we are to break out of our dogmatic caves into the light of a new day.

"Churchgoers are divided not by perpendicular lines between Churches, but by one horizontal line dividing the traditionalist believer in a faith once for all delivered at some moment in the past, and the liberal or modernist who, without disparaging the prophets of a former day, seeks a religion which is the natural expression of the here and now."

Scores Pope

Paris (wireless to RNS): — Pierre Herve, French Communist leader, sharply criticized here Pope Pius XII's recent letter to the German bishops lamenting the miseries caused by the war in western Europe, and particularly in Germany.

Writing in Humanite, Communist newspaper, Herve declared that the French people "have reason to know that if the Germans are now suffering from the effects of the war, they have heartily deserved them, and that those they inflicted on victim nations were a hundred times worse."

The Communist writer demanded that the Pope "if he wants to show his authority and his justice, should brand the Germans as criminals and not sympathize with them in the misery they have brought on themselves."

Priests Arrested

Tirana, Albania (wireless to RNS):—Two prominent Jesuit priests have been arrested as war criminals by the Scutari branch of the National People's Defense, according to the Tirana newspaper Bashkimi (Unity). They are Father Daniel Dajani, rector, and Father Giovanni Fausti, vice rector, of the Jesuit College in Scutari. The priests are charged with having organized and directed the pro-Fascist terrorist organization known as Bashkimi Shqiperise (Albanian Unity). It is alleged that equipment for the publication of Fascist propaganda leaflets were found in the 50-year-old university. Other charges against the priests are that they were implicated with a group of Catholics, including Professor Gjelish Luli, who were taken into custody earlier for alleged complicity in an armed revolt staged last winter by the war criminal Llosh Maroshi.

The arrests highlight attacks against "reactionary" Catholics which have appeared recently in Bashkimi and other newspapers and have been aimed largely against the Jesuit Order. The attacks are espepecially directed against Italian priests and call for their removal from Albanian territory.

Orthodox groups in Albania are said to be incensed against the Roman Catholic minority because several Catholic priests allegedly cooperated with German occupation authorities during the war. According to a Jesuit spokesman, however, although some priests did collaborate with the Germans, they did so only because they feared the Germans "were going to stay forever," and wished to protect the freedom of the church and its property.

Religious Freedom

Geneva (wireless to RNS):—Russian authorities have not interfered with the free practice of religion in Rumania, according to a first hand report brought to the World Council of Churches here by Madame Marie Braesco, of the executive committee of the Rumanian Red Cross. The report was the first of its kind received by the Council from Rumania since the end of the war.

"From the religious point of view," Madame Braesco declared, "Rumania is not an occupied country. Many of the Rumanians of German origin who were deported to Russia last year were members of the Lutheran or Reformed Churches, but neither the Orthodox Church nor the many Baptists, Seventh Day Adventists and Roman Catholics have been molested."

Building Boom

New York (RNS): — The United States is facing the biggest church building boom in its history according to leading architects who attended the North American conference on church architecture here. Representing most of the states of the union, the church leaders and architects agreed that new materials and methods of construction might help neutralize, to some extent, the present high cost of building. Plans and designs exhibited at the conference showed few extremely modernistic churches, but all had provisions for recreation and social rooms.

Goes to India

New York:—The Rev. E. Stanley Jones has been granted permission to return to India after having been denied a visa throughout the war. He now plans to spend half of each year in India and the other half in the United States. Speaking at a dinner here he said that a combination of American individualism, Russian collectivism and a Christian "moral basis for society" is the hope of the future.

List Religious Belief

London (wireless to RNS):—The assembly of the Church of England has petitioned the government to have religious belief or affiliation listed in the next census. It is stressed however that individuals should be left free to withhold such information.

SAMUEL THORNE
Layman of New York City

Your editorial committee certainly struck a timely note in its editorial on unity and prayer. The proposal for steps toward unity with the Presbyterians as offered under the resolution of the General Convention in 1937, and subsequently approved by them, is certainly a deeply spiritual challenge, and the spiritual approach cannot be over-emphasized. Where can such an approach be found than through understanding and unselfish prayer? I wish we could have not only a single prayer but a short form of litany that might bring home, particularly to the laity, the tremendous demand that faces our Church at this time for penitence and true humility and a readiness to approach the great problems of spiritual warfare with the same willingness to sacrifice as shown by the men who laid down their lives in World War II.

MARY A. TOWNSEND
New York Churchwoman now in London

THE WITNESS for December 13 has just reached me in London and I want first to reply with enthusiasm to Bill Spofford's Talking It Over. I am guilty of having been interested in raising money for the Reconstruction Fund but since I came here in December I have been particularly conscious of the horrible conditions on the Continent of Europe. It does seem that ten percent of the R. & A. Fund is far too little a proportion to give to the putting in order of those devastated areas. I wish I were in the U.S.A. to shout from the housetops about this.

As to the editorial Men for the Ministry I do hope that when candidates for theological training are corralled they will be imbued before they start their training with the ideals of churchmanship for which THE WITNESS stands. We can't leave everything to hope. And we can't leave much to the seminaries until some of them are reformed.

I will see that all my friends in this country read the article on the pro-Franco organization of the Roman Catholic Church.

N. M. DEADERICK
Churchman of New York City

Please allow me to express through your valued columns my heartfelt agreement with Sgt. James F. Mauser's statement on Protestantism and to join with the Rev. George Trowbridge in believing that his view represents the hope of the Church. Also I would like to use this opportunity to say that the young people in my parish heartily approve of THE WITNESS. That, to me, is most significant as they are not usually in tune with Church publications and are very critical, as most younger people are these days.

JOHN F. MAYNARD
Rector of French Church of Saint Esprit, New York

Editor of THE WITNESS:

I want to register a protest against your printing religious news from France which is apparently over-partial to the reactionaries, whose tower of strength is the MRP. The Roman Church is using that party as it did use the old Right wing since 1789. RNS says for instance that the Communist Party is opposed to state aid for the non-state schools; so are the Socialists and the Radical Socialists. The RNS says that the Bishops claim that what they ask is what the Allies fought for. I thought that the United Nations wanted freedom of religion. It would be interesting for once to hear R.C. bishops ask it for Protestants. The RNS informs us that the Bishops want the family's right to choose the type of school to which children should be sent. There is no question that the right exists in France as in America.

May I ask that sometime ago you printed a statement by Francisque Gay that the MRP is not closed to non-Catholics. Gay may think so but Schumann who is the head strikes off the name of any Protestant or Jew on the party rolls. And for that I am thankful. It prevents them from pulling chestnuts out of the fire, although some love to do it. But don't we know that kind here. Won't they ever learn?

Layman of Wanamassa, N. J.

The worthy brother from Wollaston, Mass. (Backfire, Jan. 17) apparently does not distinguish between "Catholic" as used in the liturgy of the Protestant Episcopal Church and "Catholic"—a member of the Roman Catholic Church. When our average Episcopalian says "Catholic" he means all of Christendom; that is, he hopes for the eventual spiritual unity of all Christian faiths. Mr. Mainwaring also forgets that the word "Protestant" is still in the official title of our Church in spite of periodic pressure to have it deleted. Brother Mainwaring is guilty of that of which he accuses Sergeant Manser of lacking. Many of us in the Protestant Episcopal Church do need more education about our Church but we must remember that the majority of us are still Protestant and glad of it.

MRS. ALEXANDER N. WARNER
Churchwoman of Titusville, Pa.

THE WITNESS seems to me to be increasingly interesting and helpful and I congratulate all you who are responsible for it. The article by the Rev. Herbert W. Prince on Competition or Cooperation? (Jan. 10) is one of the finest I have read. It is also gratifying to have Talking It Over (Jan. 17) emphasize this important matter of wise and Christian reconstruction. Surely the stage is set for cooperation.

National Council Approves Increased 1946 Budget

James Thayer Addison To Head a Delegation To Visit the Orient for a Study of Needs

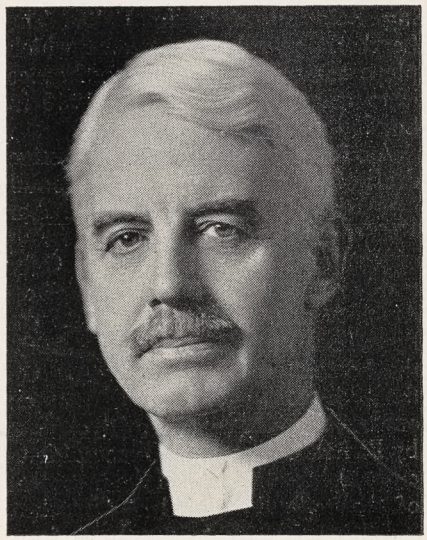
By W. B. Spofford

New York:—If money is news, as I am assured by newsmen, then the Episcopal Church is doing all right. Treasurer Lewis B. Franklin reported to the National Council, meeting February 12-14, that in 1945 receipts from dioceses were $87,256.32 higher than in 1944 and $26,159.25 in excess of the estimate used at the beginning of 1945 in balancing the budget. He also stated that the year closed with a balance of income over expenditures of $10,232.72, with China not in the account since it has not been possible to get final figures from that missionary field. Forty-six dioceses and districts overpaid their expectations, accepted at the beginning of the year, and all of the others paid 100%.

Due to a continued decline in interest rates the income on trust funds applicable to the budget was $20,034.93 less than the estimate but it was at the rate of 3.39% on the book value of investments, which is doing all right, things being as they are these days.

As for 1946 the Council approved a budget of $2,735,058 which is $117,421 more than the budget for 1945. This money is to come from payments by dioceses, with a margin of safety provided for; income from trust funds; share of the United Thank Offering, for a total of $2,558,167. The remaining $176,891 is what is called "lapsed balances" which means items in the budget which the Council anticipates will not be spent. A large part of this is for work in China where there is an item of $95,057, in addition to the regular budget for China, a large part of which probably will not be spent since work there and in the Philippines is being resumed gradually so that full operations are unlikely this year.

As for the Reconstruction and Advance Fund, no figures were announced as to the amount so far raised or in sight, but there was a general expression of optimism at the Council meeting. Discussion was chiefly on what can be done to jack up the slow dioceses, some of which apparently are not showing a great deal of enthusiasm.



Almon R. Pepper, social service secretary who is spending most of his time these days handling the Presiding Bishop's Fund for World Relief, which are extras that come to the Council and are outside the regular budget, reported receipts and allocations during 1945 amounting to $108,460.32. Of this $3514.39 came from the Reconstruction and Advance Fund. Money went to the various relief agencies in Europe and Asia of the World Council of Churches; the American Bible Society; War Prisoners Aid; YMCA; Friends Service Committee; YWCA; World Student Christian Federation.

Presiding Bishop H. St. George Tucker announced that the committee of the Council to visit China, the Philippines and Japan, would be headed by Vice-president James Thayer Addison, accompanied by Treasurer Lewis B. Franklin, Mrs. Arthur M. Sherman, executive secretary of the Auxiliary and the Rev. Robert A. Magill, rector of St. John's, Lynchburg, Va. They are to leave in May if possible and will survey Church conditions, confer with Church leaders and later report on needs, priorities and opportunities.

The Council also authorized Bishop Charles S. Riefsnider, former Bishop of North Kwanto, Japan, to go to Japan as soon as arrangements can be made, to confer with and advise Japanese Bishops and other Church leaders there. It was explained that requests had come to Bishop Tucker from Japan for such a visit.

The Rev. Arnold M. Lewis, for the past five years an army chaplain and before then rector of St. Mark's, Westhampton Beach, Long Island, was appointed director of the Committee on Laymen's Work. He succeeds the Rev. W. C. Campbell who resigned to accept the rectorship of a parish in Pittsburgh.

Lindley M. Franklin Jr. was also introduced to the Council. He succeeds Richard P. Kent as assistant treasurer of the Council. Prior to military service he was assistant manager of the real estate department of a Brooklyn bank. He is a nephew of Lewis B. Franklin, treasurer of the Council.

James Thayer Addison, vice-president of the National Council, is to head a committee to study conditions in the Orient

The Council listened to an address by Bishop Bentley of Alaska who told of changes in his vast district (586,400 square miles: population, about 80,000) which resulted from the war, particularly the opening of roads and improvement in transportation and communication facilities. He then did the rather rare thing of announcing that Alaska did not wish to share in the Reconstruction and Advance Fund.

The army and navy division of the Council, which came into being January 1st, taking over the work of the A. & N. commission, reported through Secretary J. Burt Webster, that 264 chaplains have been discharged from the services and that 164 of them have found work in the Church. So there are 100 now looking for jobs. Secretary Webster emphasized that the division wants to help chaplains find jobs but that it has no power to appoint men and wants it clearly understood that this is a diocesan responsibility. The Council meeting, incidentally, met in the parish house of Calvary Church, nearby, since the board room where meetings have always been held previously has been taken over by the army and navy division.

The Presiding Bishop announced that the Archbishop of Canterbury has informed him that the Lambeth Conference will be held in 1948. This meeting of Anglican bishops throughout the world normally meets every ten years. The last meeting was in the summer of 1930, no meeting being possible in 1940. The Lambeth consultative group which plans the agenda for the conference is to assemble on July 23, 1946 in London.

As for the Auxiliary, a tentative draft of the program for the triennial meeting in Philadelphia, September 10-20, was released at the meeting of the executive committee. Only two names are presented: Bishop Angus Dun of Washington, is to deliver four meditations on the faith, the home, the world, missions. On the 18th there will be an address on our responsibility as world citizens by Bishop G. Bromley, Oxnam, Methodist bishop who is also the president of the Federal Council of Churches.

With reference to a request from the last triennial meeting that the executive board consider the representation of Negro and other minority groups at the Philadelphia meeting, the board is asking a committee composed of three board members and three representatives of minority groups, to study the matter and report at the April meeting.

A considerable number of appropriations were voted; equipment for foreign missionaries for their personal needs; aid for women students of Central China College in moving from Hsichow to Wuchang; help for native workers in the Philippines and China; $5,000 to enable Bishop Harris of Liberia to fix up the kitchens and bathrooms at the House of Bethany and Emery Hall; a grant to the American Bible Society; and some toys and games for the Mexican mission at El Paso, Texas, where, the board learned, the children using the recreation room take turns playing with the one and only doll.

ANNUAL MEETING OF CLID

Washington:—The annual meeting of the Church League for Industrial Democracy is to be held tomorrow, Washington's Birthday, in the parish house of the Church of the Epiphany here. The speakers at the luncheon are the Rev. Joseph F. Fletcher of the faculty of the Episcopal Theological School, who is to speak on whether or not clergymen should take sides in an industrial dispute, and specifically whether they should take part in picketing. The other speaker at the luncheon is Mr. Joseph Evans, the former regional director of the Fair Employment Practices Committee. The Rev. Charles Sheerin, rector of the parish, will chair the luncheon meeting.

The conference will open at 10 o'clock with reports by the present executive secretary and with a discussion of the program of the organization and such action as is called for to bring it up to date. At the 1945 meeting it was decided to revise the program annually. Following the luncheon the newly elected executive secretary, the Rev. William B. Spofford Jr., will outline what he considered to be the task of the League today, with whatever action is called for to follow the address. Planning for General Convention activities will also be done and it is further hoped that as a result of the meeting a permanent chapter of the CLID will be established in this city. The chairman of the arrangements committee is Mr. Arthur Fawcett.

SOCIAL RECONSTRUCTION COMMISSION

Washington:—The commission on social reconstruction of the General Convention met at the College of Preachers February 8-10 under the chairmanship of Bishop William Scarlett of Missouri. Thirteen of the fifteen members of the commission were present, in addition to an equal number of advisors. Papers were read on such varied subjects as world organization; treatment of our former enemies; race relations; Japanese Americans; the atomic bomb; relationship of Church and state; full employment. Following each paper there was lengthy discussion after which each topic was further considered by a sub-committee which reported at a meeting of the whole, with resolutions proposed for General Convention.

Among those who prepared papers were Sumner Welles, Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, Bishop Edward L. Parsons, Prof. Arthur Compton, Professor Hocking of Harvard, Frances Perkins, former secretary of labor, Bishop Angus Dun of Washington.

COVERS A WIDE FRONT

New York:—Newspapers reported recently the story of a 24-year-old Marine who died in Iwo Jima and bequeathed a major part of his estate to "industrial and international peace." They said that Ben Toland had left a pencilled will leaving part of his estate to labor, the CIO and AFL; part to the National Association of Manufacturers in order to obtain industrial peace, and part to the Congress of the United States to "improve the nation's foreign policy."

The newspapers overlooked the fact that Ben Toland also left part of his estate to his Church, in the belief that the Christian influences of the Church must be employed effectively if peace is ever to be a reality. Check for the Church's share was received by the National Council early in February.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION IN CHARLESTON

Charleston, S. C.:—The 100th anniversary of Grace Church was celebrated on February 17, with Bishop Penick of North Carolina preaching. The present rector is the Rev. William Way.

DEAN JOHNSON ISSUES A DENIAL

Washington: — President Truman told a recent press conference that he had received a letter from Dean Hewlett Johnson of Canterbury, visitor to the United States last fall, denying the widely-printed statement carried by the American press that he had said Americans were "100 years behind in everything but religion and 150 years behind in that." The letter, which Mr. Truman read to the reporters, stated that "It was made in a jocular mood by my predecessor. I neither indorse that statement nor believe it is true."

The Colleges of the Seneca Offer Fine Programs

Hobart and William Smith Carry on the Fine Traditions of Their Distinguished Founders

By David R. Covell
Chaplain of the Colleges

Geneva, N. Y.: — "Here, gentlemen, this is the spot for the college!" Thus, according to legend, the Rt. Rev. John Henry Hobart, Bishop of the Diocese of New York, addressed his five companions on a morning in early September of 1820 as they stood on a hill overlooking Seneca Lake. Wood smoke drifted lazily up into the chilly air from the chimneys of the pioneer village of Geneva to the north of the little group.

Emphasizing his choice, the Bishop struck his cane briskly and decisively to the ground. A Geneva historian later wrote: "And on that spot it was placed."

Who were these men, leaders in the movement to bring higher education to the then uncleared and isolated wilderness of the western New York country? Three of them were churchmen—the Bishop, ecclesiastical head of the Episcopal Church in a diocese which then included all of New York state; the Rev. Orin Clark and the Rev. Daniel McDonald, both pioneer churchmen and educators. With them were Major James Rees, confidential clerk to Robert Morris, landowner; General Samuel Colt, and William S. DeZeng, prominent figures in the development of the region. Such men as these had built Geneva's first schoolhouse in 1796. Geneva Academy, to which Hobart College traces its beginnings, began life in that building, and on April 10, 1822, the Board of Regents of the University of the State of New York approved the program to raise the academy's status to that of a college. Geneva College thus became the 38th institution of higher learning to be established in the nation, and the fifth in New York State. The name, Hobart College, was officially adopted in 1860, honoring the man most active in its founding, Bishop Hobart.

It is evident that the men who first brought education to the western New York country were also leaders in bringing religion to it. They were indeed men of good will. Down through the years such men have continued to direct Hobart—the oldest college still associated with the Episcopal Church in the United States. In 1848 President Benjamin Hale introduced daily and Sunday Chapel services, and in 1862 the Swift endowment of the chaplaincy was presented to the college and St. John's Chapel was completed, a testimonial to the generous interest of William B. Douglas of Rochester. The endowment for the chaplaincy provides that the incumbent be a presbyter of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

In 1874 the charter was amended to make the Bishop of the Diocese in which the college is located (now the diocese of Rochester), ex-officio a member of the board of trustees. In 1945 it was provided by a further amendment, that the chairmanship of the board of trustees shall be filled in rotation by bishops of the Episcopal Church. Today, as always, Hobart's concern is with Christian liberal education. This concern has never been static nor so narrowly confined that the broad practical aspects of education have been lost.

More than a century ago, on March 1, 1824, Hobart College took the lead in an educational development of far reaching significance. This undertaking was the establishment of the first college course without Greek or Latin introduced into any college in the English speaking world, an innovation to save time and make room for applications of science useful to farmers and business men. This departure from educational traditions three centuries old opened the way to the elective system and, with the early addition of a foreign language, represents pretty fairly the general line of American college work today.

In 1945 Hobart, with its partner in the Colleges of the Seneca, William Smith College for women, announced a new program designed to correct "the fragmentation of the liberal arts curriculum." To produce responsible leadership in the Christian tradition in both the returning service man and in the youth entering college from high school, Hobart believes that it is necessary to acquire a genuine understanding of the character of Christian civilization and of American civilization as its outgrowth. This is the central aim of the new curriculum.

At Hobart and William Smith Colleges undergraduate work covers the four fields of human knowledge — philosophy and religion, the humanities, the social sciences, and the natural sciences. Faculty members from all four divisions cooperate in teaching two key course programs which relate all the courses of study in a unified whole. These integrated programs begin with the study of Greek and Biblical origins of Christian civilization and carry the student through to modern times. They lead to a maturer understanding of modern problems and a deeper knowledge of the complex forms of present day society.

Dr. John Milton Potter is the President of Hobart and William Smith Colleges

Placement and qualifying examinations allow each student to progress through his college career at the rate most desirable for him as an individual. Both an honors program and a program in general studies are offered at the advanced level.

The founders of Hobart believed deeply and sincerely that knowledge without spiritual and moral growth is a dangerous weapon. The men who direct the Colleges of the Seneca today are of the same conviction. As always throughout its history, Hobart maintains religion on its campus. Attendance at St. John's Chapel or participation in activities of the church of the student's own faith in Geneva are a natural part of the program of study. This is combined with personal and friendly guidance by the chaplain and a faculty of God-fearing men and women. Against such a background of religious experience, students at these colleges are enabled to evaluate their secular knowledge in proper perspective.

The practical aspects of Christian liberal education in the everyday world are not neglected. A program of career determination is provided to permit students to find, for themselves, the life work for which they are best fitted.

Alumni of the colleges have won distinction in many fields. As an indication of leadership, Hobart ranked seventh in one survey, and thirteenth in another, among all the colleges and universities in America on the percentage of graduates listed in Who's Who in America. Since its foundation in 1822, hundreds of Hobart men have become priests, and 33 have become bishops of the Episcopal Church.

Both Hobart and William Smith are accredited by all the major agencies in the United States authorized for accreditation in New York state. A chapter of Phi Beta Kappa was established at Hobart as early as 1871, and was extended to include William Smith in 1908.

Under the strong leadership of Dr. John Milton Potter, another of those men of good will who have guided Hobart throughout its 124 years, both colleges are successfully weathering the critical years resulting from the war. Rooted firmly in the Christian traditions in which they were founded, alert to the needs and changes of the modern world, the Colleges of the Seneca, Hobart (for men) and William Smith (for women) are well on their way to their goal—that of being the foremost Christian liberal colleges in the United States of America.

VIRGINIA SEMINARY SEEKS FUND

Alexandria, Va.:—The Virginia Theological Seminary has opened a campaign for a half million dollars to restore the older buildings and replace St. George Hall which has been demolished. This building was originally built by members of St. George's Church in New York in 1850 and was the dormitory in which Phillips Brooks roomed for two years as a student before the Civil War. Since the building was torn down because of structural weaknesses, the normal capacity of the Seminary has been reduced from 83 to 55 students. It is hoped that the new St. George Hall will enable the Seminary to accommodate 100 or more students. The director of the campaign is the Rev. Charles W. Sheerin, rector of the Epiphany, Washington. Among prominent Churchmen who are sponsors are Edward Stettinius; Alexander W. Weddell, former ambassador to Spain; Charles P. Taft of Cincinnati; Harper Sibley of Rochester, N. Y.; Admiral William Thomas, chief of chaplains; Presiding Bishop Henry St. George Tucker.

Students of Hobart and William Smith Colleges stroll along the shore of Seneca Lake which adjoins the campus

BISHOPS FIGHT AGAINST DISCRIMINATION

Boston: — Bishop Sherrill of Massachusetts and Bishop Lawrence of Western Massachusetts are among a number of religious leaders supporting a bill which will enable enforcement of fair employment practices.

MARY K. SIMKHOVITCH TO BE HONORED

New York:—Mary K. Simkhovitch, who recently retired as director of Greenwich House which she founded forty-four years ago, is to be honored at a dinner to be held on March 5th. A fund is to be established as a permanent testimonial for her many years of service at the famous settlement house. The objective is $44,000, which will represent $1,000 for each year of her leadership.

WORK WITH COLLEGE STUDENTS

Cambridge, Mass:—Miss Barbara Arnold, secretary of college work in the province of New England, was the speaker at a luncheon of the college work committee of Massachusetts on February 8. It was held at the home of the chairman, Rev. Frederic B. Kellogg, chaplain to Episcopal students at Harvard, and was attended by sixteen clergy and student workers. Miss Arnold spoke on the opportunities for working with college students, particularly the returning service men.

TEN MILLION FOR HIGH SCHOOLS

Buffalo (RNS): — A ten million dollar program for construction of Roman Catholic high schools throughout the diocese of Buffalo has been announced. It is planned for a minimum attendance of 400 and a maximum capacity of 1,400 for each school, with bus service in country districts to bring the pupils to central schools.

EDITORIALS

Building After the Boom

THE plethora of ambitious financial appeals which come from every side to the desk of the parish clergyman, show us that men of great affairs feel that now is the time to get money, and perhaps the opportunity will not come again. Many of these appeals include ambitious building programs. Some churches are following this trend, and we are shown plans of new church buildings ranging from the extreme modern to 13th century in style.

When church architects (real ones) look at these plans, they sometimes criticize them for lack of honesty. They say that when a steel-girder building is designed as if it were built stone on stone, the feel of true Gothic architecture is lost, and the dishonesty invariably shows somewhere. Gothic architecture itself was in essence functional; it was designed to meet the devotional needs of the people, to supply plenty of light during the winter of northern Europe, and to allow for stone roofs which were fire-resistant. If the architect of today wishes to use steel girders, these men say, he should not pretend that he did without them.

Extreme modernists in this line state that the Gothic "feel" should be entirely eliminated; yet some of their projects which follow this strictly appear to lack every devotional sense. Some modern architects are not praying men, and for them to design buildings to be used by people of another type, for a purpose with which the architect himself is unfamiliar, is like having a Cuban design houses for the inhabitants of Greenland.

The problem before us, however, may be not so much one of style as how we can secure needed church buildings at all if money suddenly stops flowing in.

If we are agreed that functional architecture is good architecture, that honest architecture should be the basis for religious building, our problem is partially solved. If you go about the country looking at the homes and the barns of the farmers, which of the two would you rather convert into a church building? Obviously the simple lines of the barns are more useful for this purpose than the sometimes over-decorated houses.

Too few churches have recognized the possibilities in abandoned commercial and industrial buildings. Banks and factories sometimes stand unoccupied while pitiful little portable churches are put up in the same neighborhoods. It is true that when a bank or factory closes the neighborhood may be on the way down, but it is in precisely these neighborhoods where the lack of money and need for churches are apt to be greatest. We need not be put off by the fact that most of the adaptation of this type in the past has been the use of stores with "windophanie" inexpertly pasted on the windows. One of the most beautiful chapels in an English Cathedral was once a cattle byre.

A nice functional factory could well be called the Chapel of Christ the Carpenter with decency and aptness.

In such structures as these, necessary decorations could be made by the people themselves, under the direction of an architect, which would be much more proper than having everything done by commercial decorators. While some amateur bits of beautification are perfectly awful, they are much easier to get rid of than the same thing might be if it were a memorial gift.

Professional architects and artists will always be needed; but when there is no money to engage or carry out their designs, it would be wrong to let the church stand still in its building program.

If money thus became tight again, as some expect it will, parishes may still go forward with the adaptation of needed building. Some of this adaptation will be the proving ground of the church architecture of the future, supplying what some completely modernist architecture seems to lack; and after that, when money becomes available again, there will always be the pressure from those who respect building programs above all other programs, to call in the architects and build the structural masterpieces of the future.

TO BE a Christian means to hold convictions radically opposed to many if not most of the ideas which are constantly expressed over the radio, by the press, in the movies, by government officials and from many church pulpits. A major problem for Christians then is how to hold loyally to our beliefs about the meaning of love in personal, international, racial, political and economic relations, without permitting the constant tension of disagreement with personal friends, church associates, social institutions, and political policies to embitter or to crush us. There can be but one solution. It is to be found in more selective listening, reading, and meditation on what is good and true and beautiful; in more constant communion with God; in more daring ventures to bring in His Kingdom of righteousness and peace.

Something New Has Been Added

IN ADDITION to the articles already announced for Lent on Issues to Come Before General Convention we are pleased to announce the addition of an article on Time to Reform the House of Deputies by Sidney E. Sweet, the dean of Christ Church Cathedral, Saint Louis.

The first of the series will appear in our next issue and will deal with The Relationship of the National Council to the Whole Church by the Rev. Harry Longley, rector of St. John's, Charleston, West Virginia. To insure delivery of this issue orders must be in our New York office, 135 Liberty Street, New York 6, not later than this Saturday, the 23rd. Orders received after that date will have to start with our issue of March 7th since paper shortages prevent us from printing extra copies of the February 28th number to take care of anticipated orders.

Massey Shepherd Continues

IT IS one of the most characteristic features of the Anglican Communion that its "rule of faith" is identical with its "rule of prayer." We do not have a long "confession of faith" of the kind the Reformation and post-Reformation periods produced in quantity, both in Protestantism and in Rome (the Catechism of the Council of Trent, for example). We are averse to overmuch defining of the faith. If you want to know what Episcopalians believe, read the Book of Common Prayer . . . and not just the Articles of Religion at the end. Our faith is enshrined in the book as a whole, most of it straight out of Holy Scripture. By the same token, one of the most characteristic things about Episcopalians is their love for the Prayer Book. In the concentration camps in China and the Philippines, many a churchman took this as his one permitted book, assuming, perhaps, that others would take the whole Bible. It is no wonder, then, that one of the best features the WITNESS has ever produced is Dr. Massey Shepherd's series, The Living Liturgy, in succession to the late Dean Ladd's famous Prayer Book Interleaves. We are grateful to him for this series, and are delighted to know that it, like its predecessor, will be published presently by the Oxford University Press. And we are sincerely grateful, with the great majority of our readers, that Professor Shepherd is continuing in these pages with a second series on The Living Liturgy.

Maude Royden: Preacher

By MARJORIE HOAGLAND
Churchwoman of New York

MAUDE ROYDEN, one of England's most distinguished women and long its leading woman preacher, eventually may be known primarily for one thing: her brilliant statements of Christian principles in relation to building a just, ordered and acceptable "one world." As she says, ". . . what I can see, others can see, and nothing will persuade me that the world is not yet ready for an ideal for which I am ready." And whether writing about Political Christianity or Prayer as a Force she has presented strongly that to be resigned in the face of the world's existent situation is a vice.

It's particularly pleasing that an American, The Rev. Joseph Fort Newton, initiated her career.

Miss Royden was born in 1876, the daughter of Sir Thomas Royden, first baronet of Frankby Hall and a former lord mayor of Liverpool, who headed the Cunard Steam Ship Company's board of directors. She was educated at Cheltingham Ladies' College and at Lady Margaret Hall, Oxford University, taking honors in modern history. Later she became the first woman lecturer of the Oxford University Extension Delegacy, speaking on English literature. Her D.D. degree came from Glasgow University. In 1930, she was named a companion of honor to the queen.

For several years after finishing school, Miss Royden engaged in social service work in Liverpool's worst slums, trying to understand the complexities of the problems of the poor. Then she edited the suffrage magazine, The Common Cause, adhering strictly to the legal side of the movement. She became well known to a small but powerful group of liberals as a writer on behalf of a new internationalism and a pleader for all great human causes—but, and this is significant, one who remained true to the Church.

She had become convinced that the day's basic needs were spiritual, and their answer to be found in an honest following of Christ. To her this wasn't an open-sesame phrase giving exit through the back door so that justice and right could be safely and piously ignored—instead, it was an affirmation to be followed by swift action.

During 1917 . . . a time of war and horror for England and America alike . . . her great opportunity came. Dr. Newton realized that England and especially London had become a terror-stricken no-man's land, filled with hearbroken women. As head of the City Temple, called "the cathedral of non-conformity," he decided that "a woman of genius" could meet the special need, speak to the people and re-state Christianity in modern terms. He knew Miss Royden's excellent writings, he was familiar with the fact that while she personally was devout almost to asceticism, she had broad human sympathies. He knew of her membership in the labor party, and her work in the woman's movement. He did not know whether she could preach, and neither did Miss Royden as doing so never had entered her mind. In any event he expected to be attacked viciously for his pioneering action—and he certainly was.

He sent out brief announcements that Miss Royden would preach. As he said, many, perhaps most, of London's churches were all but deserted; the rank and file of people had come to seek their answers to life elsewhere. His innovation caught public attention. As the hour of the evening meeting approached crowds formed and filled the church, the square outside and several blocks beyond.

A slight, frail young woman . . . only about five feet tall, walking with a slight limp . . . rose to speak. There was a perceptible straining forward to hear her. Then her rich, mellow, well-modulated voice filled the temple and she talked sincerely, simply and prophetically on The trustworthiness of God.

MANY who perhaps had come to scoff, or from curiosity, stayed to pray. From that moment on she had an immense unofficial congregation that followed her everywhere. Her sermons were published in book form in England and America, the sales spiraling constantly as she dealt with present problems in the light of Christ's teachings. Magazines requested articles from her and about her. In time, the radio became a media. She had become a revolutionary, yet deeply Christian, force in the life of two nations.

Soon Maude Royden began a clinical service, spending several days a week at the City Temple for personal conferences with those in distress. Afterwards, as she forthrightly disbelieved in a one-way sermon to which listeners could not reply, even under provocation, she instituted a forum period at the end of her remarks and submitted herself to questions, criticism and just plain heckling. Probably only her profound humility got her through it without damage to her prestige. Her ability to understand the other person, even when they announced, as one did, that they "had done with God," often turned agnostics and critics into stout followers.

She remained at the City Temple until 1920 as assistant preacher. Then she founded with the Rev. Percy Dearmer the fellowship services at Kensington which later were transferred to the Guildhouse—an ugly building in Eccleston Square slums. As usual the crowds far exceeded the building's capacity. Her physical strength was limited—she had to lie down for an hour after each sermon, before going home—but even so she accepted many outside speaking engagements. She did not hesitate to lead controversial causes when she felt Christian principles were involved. It is a little difficult to realize, in 1945, how many things were regarded as controversial during and immediately after world war one. She made several trips to America.

Dr. Royden's books include, besides the two named above, Women and the Sovereign State, The Hour and the Church, Sex and Common Sense, Beauty in Religion, Friendship of God, The Church and Women, Christ Triumphant, I Believe in God (one of the Harper's series in theology) and Here and Hereafter. In all of them, she shows that she is too profoundly honest to be dogmatic, too full of love to be bigoted or irrational. She gathers even her critics into one great embrace, as after all her Father's children. Yet there are many statements rapier-like in their fury at deliberate injustice and evil that injures others, particularly the humble people of the world.

As one man, himself a famous speaker, said of her, "Dr. Maude Royden is to my mind the finest preacher in Christendom — and it's mainly because she makes her hearers feel she really means what she says."

May God speedily send us other Christians like her.

Talking It Over

By
W. B. SPOFFORD

SOME miles from the city of Charleston, W. Va., there is a little company coal town named Prenter. Years back the miners, organized in a little union that was independent of the big one led by John L. Lewis, were on strike. The issue was simple: the law of the state required a checkweighman at the mine: a man chosen by the workers to see that weighing was done honestly since the miners were paid by the ton rather than at an hourly rate. The company at Prenter disregarded the law so the workers were striking to enforce it. They were having a tough time, not alone from hunger, but because of deputy sheriffs sent in by the state whose law the miners were striking to enforce. They smashed up meetings; they used guns which killed one and injured several others.

Some in the Church were concerned and raised money for relief which I was asked to deliver to the president of the union with headquarters in Charleston. He told me about a meeting of the strikers the next day and invited me to sit-in on a committee meeting where plans were to be made. Trouble was anticipated. So they decided that Tom Tippett, one of their leaders who was scheduled to speak, had better not go: he was valuable and might get hurt. Whereupon everyone quietly looked in my direction.

The union president drove me to Prenter through the narrow valley with mountains rising on either side. Soon we were aware of being followed by a big car. "Goons probably," said the union leader, "but don't worry, we'll keep ahead of them."

The meeting place was the yard of a little frame schoolhouse—the only public property in the company town. In the yard was a speakers' stand and facing it, on the side of a hill that had the gradual slope of a theatre, sat hundreds of miners. "We ain't speakin' from the platform," said the leader. "The boys are puttin' up a place to speak against the building. There may be shootin' and that'll make it harder for 'em to get us in the back. One of our boys got shot here last week. But don't worry—if there's shootin' it'll start soon as we get goin' an'll be over right smart. OK—let's get goin'. You're first."

It wasn't a good speech. For one thing a gun was pointed in my direction while I held forth. No shot was fired. I was told later that it was a friendly miner indulging in the sport common to the area of "seeing whether the guy can take it." I got back to Charleston.

From there I went to Chicago to board a train for Denver to report General Convention. Attached to the train was a special car of an officer of the road, assigned with the compliments of the railroad, to the Bishop of St. Albans, England, who was a Convention headliner. Acting as host to the distinguished visitor was Bishop Booth of Vermont, an old friend of mine. So I was invited to lunch, where the Bishop related to the six-foot-six Britisher something about my experience in the mining town. "Bill is inclined to mix into things that are none of his business," said Bishop Booth. "Your Lordship, how do you think a priest should act under such circumstances?"

So we listened to a talk about the courageous pronouncements on industrial relations made by the Church of England and the Lambeth Conference of Anglican Bishops. "But," said his Lordship, "the Church and its representatives should not take sides. We have to minister to all men. It seems to me proper, under the circumstances related, for good Church people to bring relief to the families of striking miners, particularly the children, the innocent victims. But a priest of the Church is not called upon to speak at strikers' meetings. Instead I think Mr. Spofford should have told the committee that while the meeting was in progress he would be in the parish church in Charleston asking God in prayer for a just settlement of the strike." Coffee and a pure Havana topped off the meal provided by the railroad after which I retired to the other end of the train to meditate.

THE story is told with the belief that it has some relationship to present events.

"Poverty and wealth are relative terms and inequality of possessions is to be expected but the contrast between individual want and collective plenty cannot be accepted as in accordance with the will of God."

"The Master's concern for the under-privileged and neglected folk was repeatedly manifested in his habit and teaching. That millions of the people of our country are denied the common necessities of life; that approximately one-third of our population is below the poverty level; that there is widespread want in a land that is abundantly productive, make evident the lamentable inadequacy of existing economic systems. With these conditions the Church is immediately and vitally concerned. If our present Christian civilization produced these ills then obviously it has departed from the right principles enunciated by Christ."

"Every member and family of the human race have a right to steady employment and to earn an income such as may provide the necessities of life and growth and is in accord with the wealth-producing capacity of their day."

"Every man has the right to employment of a kind that is consistent with human dignity and self-respect and to such leisure as is essential for cultural and spiritual development; that employers of all kinds should recognize and safeguard these rights."

"We hold that the right of employees to organize and to bargain collectively is necessary."

These pronouncements by our Episcopal Bishops and by commissions of the Federal Council of Churches could be multiplied almost endlessly.

Is that the end of our responsibility—Talk?

There are those who think so. Thus the editor of the Living Church, commenting on a number of Boston clergymen going on a picket line, says that he "does not feel that the picket line is the proper place for a priest of the Church . . . The pastoral theology of the altar and the pulpit, the sick-bed and the confessional, the class-room and the font, is no 'spectator theology': it is the front line of the Christian battle."

Then I received a letter from a friend of mine, a thoroughly socially conscious and courageous clergyman, declining an invitation of the American Communications Association (CIO) to picket the home office of Western Union—which we did not do since the strike was settled before the day of our assignment. But his letter raises an issue:

"My position at the moment is that I would probably do more harm here (his parish) than I would do good at large by doing anything as dramatic as that. I am able to preach what I please and I don't think people have any doubt where I stand. But if I went in for picketing I would immediately arouse emotional antagonism that would be a block to getting some reason into the heads of those who are still open to some degree of convincing. But, I repeat, that is my own slant; I'll defend the right of anyone else to picket as much as they please if they believe in it. With me it is not a question of losing a job or anything of the sort; I'd simply lose what chance I have of converting people, if that is possible. I would however be all for a public statement on the industrial issues involved signed by the clergy. I think particularly of the relation between prices and wages; the refusal of GM to arbitrate, to open its books or let the public in to any hearings. Those issues are clear cut but most of the public hasn't understood them. I'd be glad to sign such a statement."

There you have it pretty clear. Pronouncements, but don't implement them with action. The L. C. editorial that the place for a priest is at the altar I dismiss by asking: Where are we to be the rest of the time—at tea, on the golf course, dining at the club? Certainly most clergymen, including me of course, have time to carry on such activities with our better padded parishioners. It would be a healthy exercise, I think, good for our own souls if nothing else, for us to take an hour a year to identify ourselves with the workers. Or is that asking too much?

As for the letter from my friend, it is my opinion that we would be more effective priests with our people if we backed our statements with action. Americans, by and large are a logical bunch, given to action, and they respect a man who backs up his convictions even when they do not agree with him. What we fail to realize I think is that they are rather cynical about the clergy. Our talk without acts brings condescending smiles even if we, through their politeness, rarely see them. I discussed the matter the other day with a group of men in my little parish, including a warden and several vestrymen. I read them the official pronouncements quoted here. The general opinion was: "Well, if the Church is damned fool enough to make such statements, go ahead. Grab a sign, go on a picket line and back them up. Better be wrong than a gutless hypocrite."

The signs I prepared, by the way, set forth in bold type official pronouncements of the Church. I figure it's a good thing to go on record with our own stuff rather than merely parade with union banners. One of them states: "We have blessed the Bread at the Altar. We have yet to bless it in the world." Maybe it would not be understood by the strikers which would make it a nice text for a speech from a sound-truck.

Perhaps we'll have a chance to use the signs yet —I rather think so.

The Living Liturgy

By MASSEY H. SHEPHERD, JR.
Professor at Episcopal Theological School

MY DEAR Readers,

With this issue I intended to bring to a conclusion the present series on the Living Liturgy. But such are the persuasive powers of our WITNESS editors that I have been prevailed upon to continue the column.

Many of you have been so kind as to ask me to publish this series in book form; and I am happy to say that this is now in process of being done. The Oxford University Press is at work on the manuscript and will put it on the market in the spring. I want to thank you, one and all, for the generosity of your time in reading this column, and for the fervor of your pens in writing me about it. Your many suggestions and criticisms will make my book a better one than it otherwise would have been. If I can offer any inducement to you to buy the book, it is that you will not have to look at my picture in it.

It is a little over two years since I began this column; and it is high time I expressed my unbounded gratitude to our WITNESS editors. To my knowledge they have never exercised their prerogative of the censor's pen, but have given me complete freedom of the press. It has been especially gratifying to have had the support of their interest in my work, not because what I write is so important, but because the high theme which I endeavor to present is so very important. The ideals and aims of the Liturgical Movement are, in my humble estimation, the earnest of incalculable benefit to "the whole state of Christ's Church," both in regard to its visible and invisible unity, and its evangelical mission to a world which is confused, sore-tried and afraid. As you all know my chief inspiration has been the work of my lamented teacher and friend, Dean William Palmer Ladd, whose Prayer Book Interleaves first saw the light thanks to the uncommon vision of the WITNESS editors. Without either his learning or wit I shall continue to try and carry on the cause from where he left off at his untimely death.

Often in the course of this series we have ventured to suggest what seem to be needed revisions in the Prayer Book. It is not that we are dissatisfied with the Prayer Book. Quite the contrary, we love it. That is why we want to see the good book made better, and perhaps more "understanded of the people." Some of the offices, such as Confirmation and Matrimony, hardly need to be touched. The Daily Office and the Litany require little change; but the Psalter needs further editing and textual revision if its marvellous riches of devotion are to be fully utilized by the ordinary man in the pew who does not read it, after the fashion of monks, with highly mystical and allegorical shades of meaning. The rite of Baptism needs a thorough going-over. The doctrine of the service is sound enough, but the language is all too often unintelligible to the laity. We must remember that most people do not hear it read very often (perhaps this is regrettable); hence the need for greater simplicity and directness. As for the Visitation of the Sick, I am still looking for the priest who even attempts to use it in its present form. I wonder, too, if other clergy share with me the awful feeling of unreality in the latter part of the Penitential Office when one reads it on Ash Wednesday morning with the congregation of lovely ladies who venture out to meet the wrath of a merciful God.

Revision of the Holy Communion is the toughest problem of all, simply because it is so basic. But at least we can say this: it needs to be more flexible so that it can be shortened; and the people should have more active participation in the prayers. Something has got to be done about the choice of many epistles and gospels. The objection so often made to any change in these selections on the grounds of not upsetting our "unity" with other liturgical churches or the devotional habits of people who now use pious manuals based upon the present lections seems to me to be fantastic.

One of our most prominent bishops has already made public his objection to any revision of the Prayer Book at too frequent intervals as "weakening and unsettling to the spiritual life and work of the Church" (WITNESS, February 7th, page 3). But why should it weaken and unsettle the Church for each generation of her children to revise and enrich their corporate prayers? It depends, I suppose, on the spirit which we bring to the undertaking. Let us agree that Prayer Book revision, like Holy Matrimony, "is not by any to be entered into unadvisedly or lightly, but reverently, discreetly, advisedly, soberly, and in the fear of God."

New Books

Excellent Good *Fair

THE NATURE AND PURPOSE OF THE GOSPELS by R. V. G. Tasker. Harpers. $1.50.

The author, who is the professor of New Testament exegesis in the University of London, appropriately dedicates the volume "To the growing number of secondary school teachers thanks to whose devotion and intelligence 'Scripture' is ceasing to be the Cinderella of school subjects." This book and others like it, if properly used by the ministers, would help to make 'Scripture' cease to be the Cinderella of religious instruction in the churches.

A busy rector can bring himself up to date on New Testament critical scholarship, a Sunday or released time school teacher can find a solid understanding of the Gospels and any layman can strengthen his grasp of the faith by reading this work. It is interestingly written and brings the reader to an appreciation of the situation which lay behind the writing of the gospels, as well as to a fuller knowledge of the connection with the Old Testament and Apocrypha and an acquaintance with the "personality" of each of the Gospels.

Chapter VI, which could be titled, "The Gospel according to Kierkegaard, or In Praise of the Paradox," evidently represents ideas recently assumed by the author and not yet integrated into his system. After wisely deprecating the extreme critical views of Streeter which were so much in style at the beginning of this century, he proceeds to prostrate himself before the new altar of crisis theology. Why must men feel called upon to follow new vogues in theology as some women rush to assume the latest and queerest hat style? This chapter brings forward a point of view which has had little influence on the remainder of the work and might much better have been omitted from the volume.

The teaching of the literature of the Bible is increasingly taught in the English departments of our American universities, as it is invading the curriculum of the secondary schools in England. Unfortunately the members of our churches still lack good strong teaching on Bible content. To the argument that only the "fundamentalists" can teach the Bible so that children can understand it, this book is a convincing answer for it is written especially for those who would teach the Gospels to children in the light of the best historical criticism.

Missouri Elects Woman Deputy To General Convention

Will Raise Issue of Eligibility of Women In Such a Form That It Cannot Be Evaded

Edited by Sara Dill

St. Louis:—In an attempt to raise the issue of the eligibility of women to serve in the House of Deputies in General Convention in such form that it cannot be evaded, the convention of the diocese of Missouri on February 5th named a woman as the first member of its delegation of lay deputies to the forthcoming General Convention. She is Mrs. Randolph Dyer, of St. Louis. In the balloting in the election Mrs. Dyer received the largest number of votes and was one of two deputies named on the first ballot.

The diocese of Missouri by attempting to seat Mrs. Dyer proposes to offer a concrete challenge to the interpretation that the word "layman" only refers to the male sex. If Mrs. Dyer should be refused a seat by the vote of the House of Deputies, the first alternate will take her place.

Missouri's woman deputy is a member of an old Church family. She is an active member of St. Peter's Church, this city, is the great granddaughter of the late Bishop F. D. Huntington of Central New York, and the great-niece of the late Rev. James O. S. Huntington, founder of the Order of the Holy Cross. Her father, Professor Henry B. Huntington, has been for many years a vestryman of Grace Church, Providence, R.I., and himself a deputy to General Convention, while her brother, the Rev. George P. Huntington, is rector of Holy Trinity Church, Tiverton, R.I. Mrs. Dyer's husband is chairman of the finance committee of the diocese of Missouri.

In placing Mrs. Dyer's name before the convention, her rector, the Rev. Clifford L. Stanley, appealed to that body to challenge the discrimination between men and women in the Church, and to present General Convention with an actual test case.

The Convention voted strong endorsements for the movement for unity with the Presbyterian Church and for liberalization of the marriage canon. It also voted to memorialize the General Convention to make possible the translation of diocesan bishops.

In his convention address, Bishop Scarlett called for positive action for organic union with the Presbyterian Church at the General Convention, and urged support within the Episcopal Church for the Federal Council of Churches. "If the decision is to push ahead at the Convention next September," he said, "I believe it will give an enormous impetus to the whole movement of Church unity and will accelerate the process all along the line. These are days when the religious forces of the nation, Protestant, Catholic, Jewish, should be drawing closer together."

Bishop Scarlett pointed to "three hopeful movements in our world today toward Christian goals." He said "the Church should find herself at the very center" of these movements. They are—the movements towards world unity, racial equality and industrial democracy.

The Rev. Henry P. Van Dusen, president of Union Seminary, New York, was the speaker at a diocesan pre-convention mass meeting in Christ Church Cathedral on Sunday, Feb. 3, to inaugurate the diocesan part of the Reconstruction and Advance Fund campaign. Bishop Keeler of Minnesota spoke on the objectives of the fund after the annual convention dinner in the Bishop Tuttle Memorial Monday evening, at which another speaker, an unexpected guest, was the internationally-known figure, Sherwood Eddy.

The diocese of Missouri was made conscious throughout the convention that its see city, St. Louis, was the original headquarters of the first missionary bishop of the Episcopal Church, the Rt. Rev. Jackson Kemper, who began his work here in 1836.

Church Protests

Boston:—The social service department of Massachusetts sent a protest on February 8th to President Truman against the return of American dead from the war fronts. Declaring the plan, which would cost a half billion dollars, a "costly pagan venture," the letter was signed by twelve Episcopal clergymen and at once won the approval of prominent leaders of other Churches. The letter was signed by William Brewster, chairman of the department, by Howard Kellett, director, and the following clergy: Gardiner M. Day, Paul T. Schultz Jr., Joseph F. Fletcher, William B. Spofford Jr., Archie H. Crowley, George O. Ekwall, Thomas A. Bridges, S. Whitney Hale. Also two laymen signed the letter, Dr. Robert Fleming and Mr. Albert R. Carter, both of the Mass. board of probation.

Similar action was taken on the same day by the social service commission of the diocese of New York by unanimous vote, and with the strong endorsement of Bishop Manning. Copies of this resolution have been sent to all bishops and social service commission of the Church. Signing this protest were Elmore M. McKee, chairman, and the following clergymen: George Edwards, Hugh Henry, John H. Johnson, Bradford W. Ketchum, Wendell Phillips, Louis W. Pitt, Richard Wamsley, Paul F. Williams. Laymen, Mrs. W. Y. Allen, Miss Louise M. Coe, Mr. Norton Fremd, Mr. William Leidt, Mrs. Lynde E. May, Mr. Andrew Oliver, Mr. Walter Pettit, Mr. George W. Van Slyck, Mrs. John B. Walker. Mr. C. C. Burlingham, distinguished lawyer and churchman, served as an advisory member of the committee which prepared the resolution.

Rural Ministry

Philadelphia:—Bishop McClelland of Easton gave four lectures during the week of February 4 at the Philadelphia Divinity School on the rural ministry. It was designed to interest the seminarians in taking up this type of work on graduation.

Want UNO Ousted

London:—It isn't only the residents of Westchester County that are making it tough for UNO by fighting the proposal to have permanent headquarters there. The assembly of the Church of England, meeting February 25, is also to act on a resolution which calls upon the British government to oust UNO from its present meeting place, Church House, which is the administrative center of the Church. The Church claims that it needs the building for "the efficient conduct" of its own business.

Maryland Convention

Baltimore:—The convention of Maryland, meeting here at St. Michael and All Angels' voted unanimously to give Bishop Powell an archdeacon to assist him in the work of the diocese. Addressing the convention were Bishop Remington, suffragan of Pennsylvania, on R. & A. Fund; the Rev. Don Frank Fenn on an interpretation of the state vestry act; Mr. Houston Jackson in the progress of Negro education; Mrs. T. O. Weddell on work of Churchwomen.

General Convention Deputies: clergy: Don Frank Fenn, Henry L. Doll, Philip J. Jensen, E. Victor Kennan. Laymen: T. F. Cadwallader, C. R. Bealmear, G. W. Denmead, Randolph Barton Jr.

Olympia Convention

Seattle, Wash.:—Bishop S. Arthur Houston told the convention of Olympia, meeting at St. Mark's Cathedral, February 3-4, that industrial democracy requires more than a voice in management and a share in profits for labor, "it demands equality of economic opportunity for all men, irrespective of race or color." He went on to condemn the A. F. of L. which in the state of Washington has opposed equality of opportunity to Negroes and Japanese-Americans.

General Convention Deputies: clergy: F. A. Schilling, L. J. Bailey, E. B. Christie, J. P. Craine. Laymen: J. E. McPherson, E. F. Colcock, I. L. Hyland, E. W. Stimson.

Plead for Relief

London (wireless to RNS):—Orderly and humane transfer of populations, as laid down by the Potsdam Conference, was demanded by the ecumenical refugee commission recently set up by the World Council of Churches at its first meeting here. The Commission strongly condemned anti-Semitism, and stressed that relief and settlement of displaced persons is no longer mainly a Jewish problem, but one of real concern to the Christian community. The group unanimously recommended that its resolutions be adopted by the provisional committee of the World Council of Churches at Geneva.

It also urged the provisional committee to request appointment of a special UNO committee to carry on and extend relief and rehabilitation in Europe when these activities of UNRRA end. In particular, it asked that attention be given to the importation into needy areas of seed, corn, fertilizers, livestock and agricultural implements so that adequate preparation can be made for future harvests.

Eleven nations were represented at the Commission meeting—Austria, Canada, Denmark, Germany, Great Britain, France, Holland, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland and the United States. Representatives of UNRRA and the Inter-Governmental Committee on Refugees also attended.

Enemy Relief

Wilmington, Del.: — The social service department of the diocese of Delaware has addressed a petition to President Truman and state Senators and Congressmen, asking that "the Potsdam agreement be modified as soon as possible to permit the sending of food and clothing to any area in the world regardless of its former belligerent status and in proportion to its need."

It also asked Governor Walter W. Bacon of Delaware to call a special session of the legislature to appropriate funds to the state board of welfare for the care of dependent children. The board recently announced that funds for this purpose would be exhausted by March.

Confirmed in Japan

Dillon, Montana: — Chaplain Arthur B. Ward of the navy sends us the story of Private John H. Roberts, an American Negro soldier from Augusta, Ga., who was recently confirmed at St. Peter's, Zushi, Japan. Private Roberts had struck up a conversation with Bishop T. Sugai of the Diocese of South Tokyo on a suburban train. Upon finding that he was an Anglican bishop the soldier asked that he might receive instructions for confirmation. He had been contemplating the step for some time but had not come in contact with a chaplain or bishop of the Church. Following discharge from the army Private Roberts plans to study for orders.

Anglo-Catholic Meetings

Rosemont, Pa.:—A series of meetings to consider proposals for unity and changes in the marriage canon are being sponsored in May by the American Church Union, organization of Anglo-Catholics. Meetings, each of two days' duration, are to be held in Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, Denver, Dallas, Los Angeles, San Francisco and Portland, Oregon. Mr. John Kremer of this city is the president of the organization and sent the call to the meetings.

Cracks at UNO

Rome (wireless to RNS):—Archbishop Enrique Pla y Deniel of Toledo, Spain, one of the new cardinals, declared in an interview here that the consistory of the Sacred College "is the first international post-war meeting really worthwhile. It is more than UNO because it includes victors as well as vanquished, big nations as well as small." He also pleaded for "fair treatment" for Spain, declaring that the country "remained neutral during the war." On the matter of Church-state relations the Archbishop said: "If public power recognizes Christ as king it must recognize his prerogatives in his own kingdom, namely, the Church. No Church can receive orders from the state. Every Church is independent under Christ the king. This means that the Church is not so much concerned over who rules the state as it is that the state does not interfere with the Church. The problem of Church-state relations never changes."

Support FEPC

New York:—Bishop Charles K. Gilbert and the Rev. Elmore McKee are among the 175 clergymen of the New York area to endorse a Madison Square Garden meeting to be held February 28 on behalf of a permanent Fair Employment Practices Committee. A large number of Church organizations also have endorsed the objectives of the meeting.

New Mexico Convention

Albuquerque, N. M.: — Plans were made at the convocation of the District of New Mexico and Southwest Texas, meeting here February 5-6, to reduce the aid given missions at the rate of ten per cent annually. Eventual attainment of diocesan status was forecast when the meeting placed an item for the support of the episcopate in its budget for the first time. It is planned to increase this item $500 annually until the bishop's salary is entirely paid by the district. The Rev. Robert S. Snyder and Mr. Ralph Faxon are the delegates to General Convention.

Meldrim House

Savannah, Ga.:—St. John's here recently bought the old Meldrim House, across the street from the church, for a parish house, which is now open to the public two days a week. It is of interest to tourists since it was the headquarters of General Sherman on his famous march to the sea.

Prepared in Germany

Albany, Ga.:—The highlight of the celebration of the 50th anniversary of the laying of the corner stone of St. Paul's Church here on January 25th was the confirmation of a lieutenant of the air corps who has received his instruction from a British chaplain in a war camp in Germany. He had a copy of the typewritten outline of the twelve lessons to show that his preparation was thorough. Bishop Barnwell preached and confirmed in the morning and at the evening service the preacher was Bishop Walker of Atlanta, a former rector of the parish. The week of festivities closed with a service at which the preacher was the Rev. Newton Middleton of Jacksonville who began his ministry in Albany thirty-one years ago. The Rev. G. R. Madson is the present rector.

Urge Unity

Washington (RNS): — American Lutherans must be willing "to join hands will all who see eye-to-eye with us" in greater unity based on the word of God and recorded in the Bible, Martin J. Heinecken, professor of theology at Lutheran Seminary, Philadelphia, told the Washington Lutheran seminar here. Attended by clergy from several nearby states, the seminar was one of the first of 38 to be held throughout the country this month under the auspices of the American Lutheran conference.

The Rev. Leonard Ludwig, of Niagara Falls, N. Y., called for "a positive rather than a negative attitude toward the remainder of Protestantism." He declared, however, that plans to merge all Lutheran bodies would only lead "to inner disunity," expressing the belief that mutual recognition of independent Lutheran bodies will favor further unity better than a merger. Seminars such as this series, he added, would go a long way toward promoting "Pan-Lutheranism."

Fighting Word

Washington: — Bishop Charles C. J. Carpenter of Alabama, here attending the meeting of the commission on social reconstruction, added considerably to the gathering with his keen wit. Discussing the R. and A. Fund with a number of clergymen, he said that the word "reconstruction" was a rather unfortunate choice, at least in his part of the country, and required a bit of explaining at meetings. To many Southerners the word is a fighting one, conjuring up thoughts of a northern invasion of carpetbaggers. He stressed however that the fund was going well in his diocese in spite of the handicap.

Fellowship Service

New York:—More than 9,000 people of many races and churches attended an interracial fellowship service last Sunday at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. Every chair in the vast cathedral was taken, with several thousand standing. It was sponsored by the Interracial Fellowship of Greater New York and local Church Federations. The service opened with a half-hour procession, including the sixty men and boys of the cathedral choir and the one hundred and twenty men and women of the interracial choir. There were sixty clergymen in the procession, representing many races and Church affiliations. The service was conducted by Canon James Green; the lesson was read by the Rev. Newton Chiang of Nanking Theological Seminary, and the benediction was pronounced by Bishop Manning.

The Rev. Howard Thurman, now dean of the chapel at Howard University and formerly co-pastor of the Fellowship Church of All Peoples in San Francisco, was the preacher.

Mississippi Convention

Jackson, Miss.: — A new constitution was considered at the convention of the diocese of Mississippi, meeting here January 22-23. Changes adding to the power of the bishop and council were rejected. The proposals cannot become final until next year.

General Convention Deputies: Clergy: J. S. Hamilton of Greenwood; O. G. Beall of Indianola; H. W. Wells of Laurel; D. M. Hobart of Meridian. Laymen: D. S. Wheatley of Greenwood; T. H. Shields of Jackson; F. R. Hawkins of Winona; Mr. Dawley, initials and parish not stated by our correspondent.

Brotherhood of St. Andrew

Jacksonville, Fla.: — The Rev. Clarence W. Brickman, national chaplain of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew has just completed an extensive speaking tour in the diocese of Florida, arranged by Morton O. Nace, a member of the national council of the organization. Meetings were held at West Palm Beach, Miami, Orlando, Tampa.

Large Gifts

Sewickley, Pa.: — St. Stephen's Church here has already contributed $40,000 to the R. and A. Fund, with the parish canvass expected to produce another $10,000. The Rev. Louis M. Hirschon is rector.

Clergy Aid Strikers

Detroit: — Ministers of this city have received appeals for aid for the strikers of General Motors, with many of them presenting the matter to their congregations. Protestant ministers also received an endorsement of the appeal from the Rev. William B. Sperry, new director of social service of the Council of Churches and an editor of THE WITNESS, in which he urged them to bring the matter before their people. Episcopalians on the national committee for aid to GM strikers are Bishop Scarlett of Missouri, Bishop Edward L. Parsons, retired Bishop of California and Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt.

Cathedral Chapter

Washington: — Three changes were announced February 11 in the chapter of Washington Cathedral by Bishop Angus Dun, following the annual meeting. David Finley, director of the National Gallery of Art, was elected to membership. Corcoran Thom, banker, retired as treasurer after serving for 29 years and is now an honorary member. Lloyd Wilson, telephone official, was elected to succeed Mr. Thom. The chapter, which functions as the cathedral's board of trustees, is a 53 year old body deriving its authority from a Congressional chapter.

favor of continuance of the emperor system in Japan. He made his views known in a statement on the suggested merger of the two leading teachers' unions in Japan. Kagawa is opposed to the merger on the grounds that the union which he heads, the Japan Educators Union, cannot agree to the opposing union's opposition to the emperor, inclusive of communists in its ranks and its policy of strikes. Dr. Kagawa's statement was made in an interview with Jiji Press, independent news agency here.

The two unions are the National Teachers Union and the Japan Educators Union. The former is anxious to merge itself with the latter for the formation of a single, unified, nationwide teachers' union. The Japan Educators Union, however, sees no necessity for the merger.

"Merger with the National Teachers Union, having among its members advocates of abolition of the Tenno (emperor) system, is simply impossible," Dr. Kagawa was quoted by Jiji as saying.

Dr. Kagawa told the Jiji Press that his union was pledged to safeguard the Tenno system and will take in no members who advocate removal of the emperor. He also indicated he was not interested in popular front movements with the communists, which movements, he explained, "would only result in strengthening the communists."

Concerning union activity, Dr. Kagawa was quoted as saying, "A teachers' union should strictly refrain from taking such violent action as strikes," and be guided instead by "bonds of love and spirituality."

St. James', New York

New York:—St. James' Parish, with a goal of $30,000 for the R. & A. Fund, has given $85,000. The rector of the parish, the Rev. Horace W. B. Donegan, recently returned from speaking engagements in South Carolina and Alabama in behalf of the Fund and reports "fine response everywhere."

Economic Conditions

Newark, N. Y.:—Christians are often sincere and kind but often blind to much that is going on in the world, said the Rev. Gardiner M. Day in addressing the Auxiliary of the diocese of Newark. He spoke of some of the un-Christlike acts of ours that led to the Japanese hatred of Americans; of the strength that would come if unity between the Episcopal and the Presbyterian Churches could be accomplished. He ended by urging his audience to bring all possible influence to bear on President Truman that the rule that prevents aid by foreigners to the Anti-Nazi Germans now returning from labor and concentration camps be repealed at once in the hope that thousands of these people may be saved from freezing and starvation.

Russian Relief

Flushing, N. Y.:—The Rev. D. L. Maclean, rector of St. George's, is the chairman of the newly formed committee for Russian Relief, Inc., for the north shore of Long Island. First meeting was held on February 19th in the parish house of St. George's when the Rev. W. H. Melish was the principal speaker. There are now more than fifty committees in the New York metropolitan area.

Condemn Army Shows

Minneapolis (RNS): — Entertainment offered the GI's still in Europe is causing the army chaplains there great concern because of its "low character," N. M. Ylvisaker, Minneapolis, president of the chaplains association of the army and navy, reported here following a tour of Europe. Ylvisaker claimed army entertainment features have contributed to the "almost complete breakdown of morality in the army since V-E day. Cheap, tawdry and bawdy entertainment will not help to build or increase morale," he warned.

Chaplains at conferences he had with them in France, Belgium, Germany and Austria discussed what was happening "openly and boldly," Ylvisaker said, "and it was plain that restraining influences must be brought to bear at once if complete moral chaos is to be averted."

He reported that the seventh army, in command of Lt. Gen. Geoffrey Keyes, already has released far-reaching directives for immediate correction of the moral breakdown. The directives were presented by Col. Loren T. Jenks, formerly of Minneapolis, ranking chaplain of the seventh army, and were adopted by the seventh army staff with but few changes.

Parish Anniversary

Philadelphia: — The 60th anniversary of the founding of St. Simeon's Church here was celebrated on February 9th and 10th. The speaker at the dinner on the 9th was Commander Richard O.Kern, former chief of the medical service at the naval hospital who served with Admiral Halsey's fleet in the Pacific. Sunday evening Bishop Hart preached and confirmed, with a reception following the service.

Denounce Bilbo

Nashville (RNS): — Accusing him of "forming an unholy compact to delay the coming of social justice in the South," 74 Baptist and Methodist ministers and laymen from 13 Southern States telegraphed a warning to Senator Theodore G. Bilbo (D. Miss.) that "political punishment . . . will be meted out in the New South to its reactionary representatives." Stirred by Bilbo's remarks on the Senate floor in which he is reported to have said "I will take care of these Baptists and Methodists," the churchmen wired him that they "resent your assuming the right to speak for Baptists and Methodists of the South."

"We wish to remind you," said the religious leaders, seven of whom are from Mississippi, "that the punishment assigned to that evil servant who said in his heart 'My Lord delayeth his coming' and began to smite his fellow servants was that he should be cut asunder and his portion assigned with the hypocrites."

The telegram concluded, "it is inevitable that conditions of justice, tolerance and equality of opportunity be created."

GORDON M. JONES
City Missioner of Toledo Ohio
FREDERICK K. JELLISON
Assistant at Trinity Church, Toledo

We note that you carry, February 7 issue, the story of Bishop Manning speaking at the Church Club dinner where he urged that "What we need in the Church now is not to revise the Prayer Book but to believe and teach and live the Prayer Book."

We respectfully submit that what Bishop Manning commends would in and of itself require a revision of the thought and practice of the churchmen for whom he speaks. Nowhere do we find the use of the American missal, fasting communions, compulsory confessions, or the refusal to permit communication at an eleven o'clock celebration of the Lord's Supper, commanded by our Prayer Book. We should think that Bishop Manning and his "Italian" cohorts would favor a revision, at least one which would favor the practices they uphold. There is plenty of room for breadth in our Church. Let's not, however, stretch that breadth so far as to lose the genius of our true Protestant and Catholic tradition. We have both. Yes, Bishop, let's "believe and teach and live the Prayer Book."

MRS. J. T. MARTIN
Churchwoman of Webster Groves, Mo.

I want to endorse with all my heart Mr. Spofford's article of January 17. I have not forgotten the time spent and the interest shown in the study of Rethinking Missions some years back among the women of our Church. Certainly now that we are called upon to reconstruct we should put into effect the conclusions reached by those experts. More of us would give more liberally I think to R. and A. Fund if we had assurance that the money would be spent cooperatively, showing our strength in Christianity through unity.

Retired Bishop of Honolulu

Prof. Shepherd's constructive article (WITNESS, Feb. 7) regarding Christian saints, our attitude towards them and our fellowship with them, may well lead to definite action. He notes the "very sensible outlook" of the Prayer Book with respect to the saints. However he craves a larger circle of acquaintances then the few who have survived the "drastic treatment of the Calendar."

In similar vein I wrote shortly before the 1943 General Convention: "Why should our generation and coming generations of churchmen know little or nothing beyond the names, and possibly not even that, of such persons as William Augustus Muhlenberg; Sir Wilford Grenfell; John Colerige Patteson; Feng Mei-tsen, priest and martyr; Launcelot Andrews; Samuel Isaac Joseph Scherechewsky; Thomas Ken; Phillips Brooks; Frederick Rogers Graves; John McKim; John Wesley; John Keble; Peter Trimble Rowe; Wilson Carlisle; Florence Nightingale; William Boone; William Hobart Hare; Rudolph Teusler; James DeKoven; Arthur Selden Lloyd; Philander Chase; Jackson Kemper and so on indefinitely. The list should be inclusive, regardless of color, sex or churchmanship; no detailed biographies; simply names, dates, places and nature of work."

Layman of Jamaica, Long Island

As much as I enjoyed reading the article Why Men Work by Randolph Miller (WITNESS, Oct. 11) there was something about it that stuck in my crop. It seemed so remote and detached from present issues. To bring in the element of laziness seemed like the Hearst crowd, when it is altogether too plain that a man may risk both his career and the disruption of his parish to speak his mind freely.

It came to me as a shock when I realized that the young girls asleep on subway benches at six in the morning were defense workers just as tired as I was, also until recently a defense worker. And in those defense shops were grey-haired women in their sixties; broken down men and cripples, all carrying the burden of defense work. One would have assumed that the glorification of those workers by men of headline prominence would have resulted in the less able being elbowed aside by the socially prominent, eager to exploit a new field of glamour.

Long before the present strike wave, it struck me that from the meager corporation returns published in the N. Y. Times one could draw a ratio between profits and payrolls. Thus, allowing of course for the value of the figures released by the corporations, the big steel, oil and motor firms employing about 400,000 offered figures that showed that payrolls exceed dividends by only ten to one. Many people cannot believe it.

But strangest of all, a careful search through trade journals to learn something of American industrial activity will reveal chiefly how well these activities are covered up. There is no commercial publication from which you can get the figures that are at the very crux of our economic problems. Moreover government figures, available to the public, are comical.

You once had an excellent article on mass production. That is a subject that offers an ideal vantage point for viewing the problems that will beset us for a very long time.

Audible Beauty

WITH SPIRITUAL APPEAL, THAT PROMOTES CHURCH GROWTH—

CARILLONIC BELLS

Churches everywhere are discovering "Acres of Diamonds" in unused towers by installing Schulmerich Carillonic Bells. The church's message in music, projected through these clear, brilliant electronic bells reach out and touch the souls of men in the whole community. Young people are inspired to think of spiritual things. As the presence of the church is made known, the message of the church is taken to the home.

A development of electronic science, Carillonic Bells are compact, moderate in cost, yet they produce far sweeter, more powerful musical tones than ponderous, old-style bells or chimes. Carillonic Bells express with glorious beauty, the ecclesiastical music of every denomination with a fidelity and economy never known before. SOWING THE SEED OF THE GOSPEL IN THE HEARTS OF MEN

● The following letter was received from a man in Puerto Rico:

● "For some time I have had a standing order for 100 copies of THE UPPER ROOM (in Spanish), and have been giving a copy to each of my companions where I work. Several weeks ago I made up my mind to discontinue this, because I felt that they did not appreciate the value of that which I found so helpful, and because it entailed the sacrifice of a part of a very limited income.

● "After the letter was written, cancelling the order, I kept thinking of it, and something within me seemed to tell me that I had acted too hastily. I felt a deep sorrow, which one feels when he commences a good work and then gives it up. About this time the shipment of the 100 copies for the next quarter arrived, as my letter had not been received in time to cancel the order for this shipment. My soul experienced great joy and at once I made up my mind to continue the work which I had begun. Please continue to send me the 100 copies forever. The seed of the Gospel has to be sown in the hearts of men."

● Throughout the world, The Upper Room is sowing—and nurturing—the seed of the Gospel in the hearts of men. Give it a chance and it will help you reap a harvest, wherever you may be.

Family Is Center of Teaching Religion, Committee Finds

Once the Parents Recognize the Importance Of Education the Standards Will Be Raised

By Philip C. Landers

Columbus, Ohio:—Increased emphasis on the family as the center of teaching religion, supplementing the traditional one hour church school session on Sunday mornings, was recommended in a report presented to the International Council of Religious Education by a committee appointed by the Council in 1944 to make a study of Christian education.

Paul H. Vieth, New Haven, Conn., professor of Christian nurture at Yale Divinity School, and chairman of the study committee, made the report, which was received by the International Council in its annual business session. The Council represents 40 Protestant denominations.

"Christian parents must become the chief teachers of religion," declared the committee, made up of 60 professors of religious education, college presidents, theologians, denominational and state council secretaries, editors, professional and lay church workers and pastors. "The locale of Christian nurture should be in the kitchen, parlor, bedroom, and on the playground as well as in the classroom."

The committee suggests that printed materials be provided to help parents teach their children religion, and that churches and communities maintain classes in parent education. Once parents recognize the importance of religious education, the report continues, they will help to raise standards of Sunday schools.

Answering critics of the Sunday school, the study committee "repudiates the implication that such inadequacies as poor planning, untrained leadership and haphazard methods are inherent weaknesses of the Sunday school. They are rather the result of lack of planning, slovenly performance of accepted duties, and disinterest on the part of ministers as well as laymen in this fundamental phase of the church's work. There are so many schools operating on an entirely different basis and in goodly measure realizing their Christian objective that we take courage. We know that the Sunday school can be effective because, in so many instances, it is."

More widespread and more practical training for those in charge of parish programs of religious education will improve the effectiveness of both the Sunday school and the home as teachers of religion, the committee report states. For the 2,000,000 lay men and lay women who in 1945 taught the 21,401,423 pupils enrolled in the nation's Protestant Sunday schools, "grass roots" training is recommended.

"Perhaps if we had spent as much time and effort and money in helping parents to do their job as Christian educators and in training pastors and key workers in the local church as we have spent upon the production of new types of curriculum and the promotion of various schemes for raising the church by its bootstraps we should now be less alarmed about the state of Christian education."

Laymen are urged to volunteer as part-time workers to furnish leadership to several churches in a particular area. "The way in which millions of persons were enlisted during the war for volunteer services requiring arduous training and many hours of often difficult labor, has caused the church once more to task where in the realm of motivation we can find for peace the equivalent of war," the report points out.

The study committee recommended that the International Council of Religious Education and the American Association of Theological Seminaries cooperate in helping seminary students and ministers "to understand, accept, and fulfill their important responsibilities in Christian education."

The International Council was asked also to join with denominational boards of education and church colleges "in the more effective preparation of all college young people for Christian service in church and community and in the recruiting and training of young people for full-time Christian service."

The study committee labeled "unfortunate" the idea that Sunday school exists only for children and that adults do not need it. "In addition to the Sunday service of worship, in addition to the educational effect of the church life and atmosphere, in addition to the training value of office-holding and committee work, men and women need classes or courses or discussion groups on important themes."

Vieth is preparing to write a book which will interpret for the layman the findings of the committee's study of Christian education. Four of the seven sub-committees among whom the work is divided have completed their work. The other three, on curriculum, community approach, and structure and functions of agencies, will report at the February, 1947, session of the International Council.

BISHOP HAINES BACKS STRIKERS

Davenport, Iowa: — Bishop Elwood Haines of Iowa was one of six religious leaders to place a three column ad in a local newspaper urging people to support workers on strike. The statement said: "As Quad-City churchmen we support the demands of organized labor for a living wage." Amplifying the statement the ad went on: "We are interested in the welfare of the people. We have always been concerned with the relationship of wages to living costs. Low wages and high cost of living mean suffering, deprivation and misery for the American people. We are firmly convinced that prosperity can exist in America only if a high purchasing power and full employment at living wages are maintained."

About 5,500 workers are on strike in the Quad-Cities; some 1,000 at the J. I. Case Company in Rock Island, and 4,500 at the Farmall plant of the International Harvester Company, Rock Island.

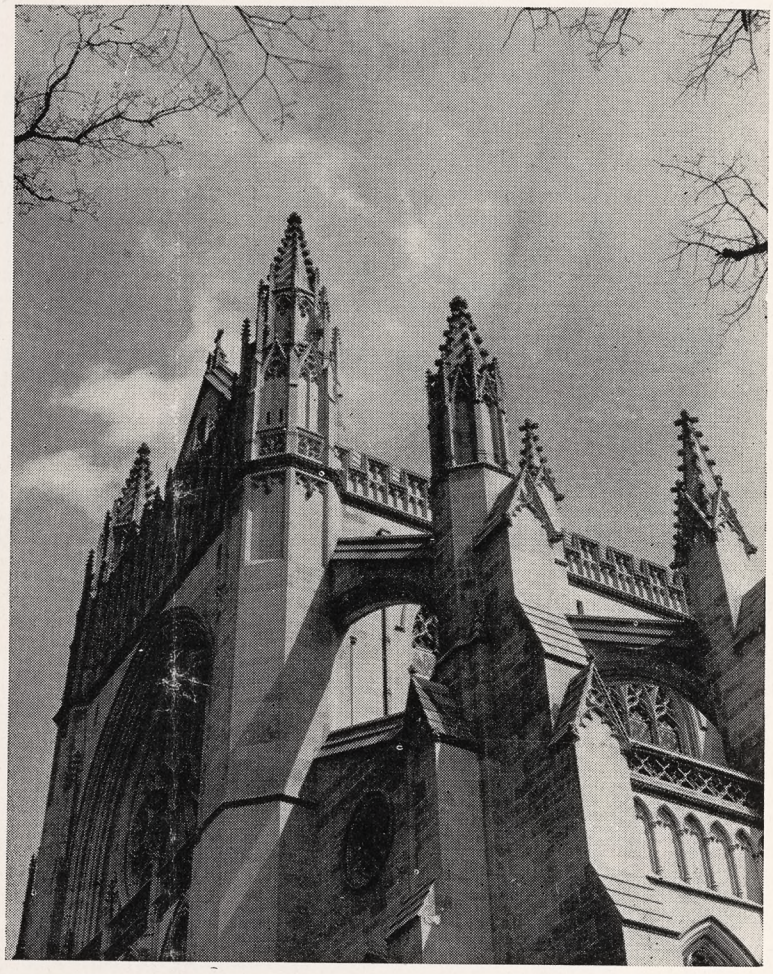
Washington:—The picture on the cover is the ninth in a series of combat pictures which were taken during the war by Fons Iannelli who was a member of the small navy photo unit directed by Captain Edward J. Steichen. These pictures, as before stated, caught as words never could do, something of what men went through during war which all must keep in mind as we work for a warless world.

The picture this week is perhaps the most graphic of the ten. When a plane returned to a carrier from a mission nobody knew the condition of the crew—wounded men, dead men, men literally in pieces so that their bodies had to be removed from the plane in pieces. These young sailors on a gun turret of the carrier are watching the removal of the crew from a plane that has just landed. What they are witnessing you will be able to imagine from the expressions on their faces.

Some readers have written that they want to forget the war. "Why remind us of its horrors with such pictures?" Our reply is that they are not war-horror pictures—we have shown no gruesome details. Rather these pictures by one of America's foremost photographers bring out something more important —what went on in the minds and souls of mere boys who had to go through war. The final picture in the series will appear on the cover of a later issue.

EXPANDING NEGRO WORK



New York:—The National Council has allocated $50,000 from the R. & A. Fund to enable the diocese of Chicago to purchase a Greek Church which will be occupied by the congregation of St. Edmund's to carry on an extensive program of Negro work. The property will cost $175,000 — originally it cost over $600,000 and includes a church and every need for a social, religious and educational program. The University of Chicago is interested and may operate a model primary school on the premises. The present St. Edmund's buildings will be sold to a Lutheran congregation.

PURCHASE GOVERNMENT MATERIALS

New York:—The National Council has authorized the expenditure of a half million dollars from the R. & A. Fund to purchase government building materials now in the Pacific areas. It includes hospital equipment, automobiles and trucks, microscopes, paint, linseed oil, turpentine, creosote, cement, hardware. Prices will be far lower than would be paid if purchases were made in the open market.

NOMINATION COMMITTEE IN MICHIGAN

Detroit: — The committee to receive nominations for suffragan bishop of Michigan, appointed by Bishop Creighton, consists of the Rev. Irwin C. Johnson, chairman; the Rev. B. S. Levering, the Rev. Charles D. Braidwood, Mr. Gordon O. Rice of Detroit; Mr. Howard F. Roderick of Grosse Ile; Mr. John C. Spaulding of Detroit; Mrs. Waldo C. Granse of Detroit. The committee is considering only men outside the diocese since it is believed that men in the diocese are sufficiently well known.

A striking view of Washington Cathedral which is about to launch a campaign for five million dollars to continue construction

HANDBOOK AND FILM ON COLLEGE WORK

New York:—The division on college work of the National Council is preparing a handbook for clergy ministering to college students and also a color film showing what college work is and how it is done. It is to be shown at summer conferences, conventions and other gatherings. Bishop Carpenter of Alabama, chairman of the division, has also announced that there will be a youth convention to be held over a weekend of the General Convention in September.

World War Veterans Protest The Return of War Dead

Sermon by WITNESS Editor Results in Many Protests to Representatives in Congress

By Sara Dill

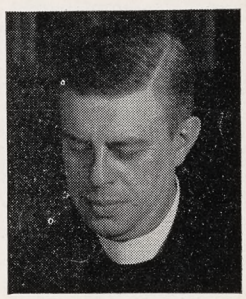
New York:—Service men attending service at the Mediator on February 17 were so stirred by a sermon that they decided then and there to wire protests to their representatives in Congress and also to President Truman. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Sydney A. Temple, Jr., a WITNESS editor, in which he called the proposal to bring home the war dead from the battlefields of the world a desecration and a racket.

"Can we allow this completely unfair and potently un-Christian scheme for filching money from those who have already suffered too much?" asked the rector. "An aroused public opinion and Christian conscience can stop it.

"We must first realize that this design is unfair to the men whose bodies are concerned. They would prefer that their bodies remain to mark the battlegrounds on which their sacrifice was made. General Patton knew when his death was near and at that time his body could very easily have been shipped home. But he desired to be buried in the ground over which he had fought. In the Gettysburg Cemetery, as dedicated by Abraham Lincoln, in Flanders Field where the poppies grow between the crosses, row on row, as immortalized by Robert W. Service, the crosses stand as a permanent memorial to the sacrifice of those men. No great stone monument can bear witness as do the graves of those who paid the highest price. They have a right to have their bodies remain in the ground that was hallowed by their sacrifice and it is eminently unfair to them that because of the whim of relatives the remains should be brought back to some tree shaded city of the dead in a deserted corner of an American city or town.

"The plot is built upon the emotional strain of the parents to whom it is no less unfair. Remember, the bodies of men who died in battle are not embalmed. There are no waterproof vaults on the battlefields of Normandy, Iwo Jima and Africa. How much body remains to be brought back? In one case after the last war, which must be representative of thousands, the coffin seemed light and it was opened by the family. All that was found was the dog tag. Not much is left when a bomb explodes or a shell bursts in the midst of a group of men. These are not pretty words, but the government is planning to spend $500,000,000 to bring these coffins back. Think what could be done with five hundred million dollars to combat juvenile delinquency among the children and younger brothers and sisters of those men, to feed the peoples freed by that sacrifice, to build a world in which it will not again be necessary for thousands to die in war.

"Why is the government spending this great sum? Because of the pressure of a morticians lobby in Congress, of course. This great expenditure by the government was only the beginning. The local morticians will collect hundreds and thousands, yes some of the large city funeral directors will make hundreds of thousands of dollars from the plot. Others have made their war profits from airplanes and firearms, why shouldn't the morticians take their war profits?



"For a Christian however these truths are not as important as the fundamental Christian denial implied with the spending of millions of dollars to bring home disintegrating bodies when the immortal soul can be met at the altar. When this world and the next come close together in the real presence of the Son of God at the Holy Communion then the loved ones are brought close to each other. Then the parents and their sons, drawing nearer to Him, are bound together by his love in the communion of the Holy Spirit, and in the fellowship of the saints. If we believe this fundamental truth of our faith we will demand the withdrawal of this pagan scheme which denies the Christian doctrine of the soul in lieu of a worship of the body.

"The ships bearing the coffins, we are told, will be painted white with a purple stripe around them. The color purple is appropriate not as signifying the penitence of the dying man, but as symbolic of the contrition that should be in our hearts when as a Christian people we have so departed from our Lord as to encourage this heathen practice. It is a sign of a generation of parents who have been careful to give the children sufficient vitamins for their bodies, but have forgotten to lead them in daily prayers for the growth of their souls; of fathers and mothers who stay up all night with a sick child, but who sleep on Sunday, send the children to Sunday School, then wonder that their souls are sick.

"If we honestly believe in the resurrection of the immortal soul in Christ Jesus, we will join our lost sons and daughters at the altar. If we are still a Christian people we will oppose this hoax with all our power, we will write to our Congressmen and oppose this pagan use of funds. All Christian morticians will join in this crusade against evil for there are many of them who care more for honesty and true religion than for easy profits. Every minister of the Christian gospel must have the nerve to come out into the open and call this thing by its true name. It is a scheme instigated by funeral directors and built upon the emotions of people who worship the dead, whose god is a cadaver."

CHURCH ASSAILS RANKIN COMMITTEE

New York:—The House Committee on Un-American Affairs was denounced last week by the board of directors of the New York Federation of Churches, with the resolution urging the million or more Protestants in the metropolitan area of New York to demand its dissolution. The board attacked the committee, dominated by Congressman John E. Rankin of Mississippi, for its "continuous interference with the freedom of our citizens" and for the "irresponsible and un-American utterances of its most vocal spokesman."

"These are serious matters in the present state of our nation and the world," the resolution said, "but we are moved to indignation by the evidence submitted to us that Mr. Nicklas, an investigator for the committee, in the presence of its chief counsel, Ernie Adamson, said to Professor Clyde Miller, of Teachers College, Columbia University, 'You should tell your Jewish friends that the Jews in Germany stuck their necks out too far and Hitler took good care of them and that the same thing will happen here unless they watch their step.'

"This statement by an employee of the United States, an investigator presumably chosen by the Committee on un-American Activities, outrages American and Christian principles, reflects on the spirit and purposes of the committee, and challenges the House of Representatives, which is the body responsible for this committee and its activities, to bring this sort of thing to an end."

The resolution closed with an appeal to its members "and all citizens of good will to register their indignation with the House of Representatives," and pledged to "our Jewish fellow-citizens," "our constant concern as Americans for their rights as citizens and our constant concern as Christians for their God-given rights as human beings."

The board re-elected the Rev. Robert W. Searle for his 12th consecutive term as general secretary of the federation.

YOUNGER CHURCHES CONSIDERED

Geneva (wireless to RNS):—Leaders of the World Council of Churches and the International Missionary Council held joint meetings here to consider the status of so-called younger Churches in the future development of the World Council. The term "younger churches" is applied to Churches in missionary lands which are still in need of outside support, but are gradually becoming self-supporting.

These Churches were represented at the meetings by Gonzago Baez-Camargo, president of the Mexican Evangelical Council; Professor Paul Devanandan, of India; and George Pu and Chester Miao, associate general secretaries of the National Christian Council of China.

It was announced that efforts had been made to enable Michio Kozaki, of Tokyo, Japan, to attend the conference, but arrangements could not be completed in time. The Chinese delegates arrived in Geneva exactly ten days after leaving Shanghai, their route covering 16,000 miles via Guam, San Francisco, New York and London.

KENYON SEEKS OVER TWO MILLION

Cleveland, O.: — Kenyon College has announced a campaign for $2,160,000 for a development program—the first time in 121 years that the college has made a public appeal for funds. William G. Mather of this city is the honorary chairman and Robert A. Weaver, also of Cleveland, is the executive chairman. The first million will be used for endowment to provide a high salary scale; the remainder will be used for new construction, the remodeling of existing buildings and for new equipment. New buildings planned are a library to cost $700,000 and a field house, including a modern gymnasium, to cost $300,000.

When the Rev. Charles F. Penniman (center) left Trinity Church, Wilmington, Delaware, to take an executive position in the diocese of Missouri, he was praised for a job well done by Senior Warden W. Albert Haddock and Junior Warden Dr. John Reese

BISHOP PAYNE SCHOOL

New York:—In reporting to the National Council on the Bishop Payne Divinity School, Bishop Angus Dun of Washington, chairman of a committee to study the problem, made it clear that the committee did not consider the question as to whether or not the school should be continued, or if so, whether it should continue at Petersburg, Va. There are those in the Church who think that there is no place for a seminary which is limited to Negro students. Rather they feel Negroes should be admitted to all the seminaries on an equal basis with other students.

The committee reported that an expenditure of $250,000 will put the school in relatively good condition; that there is no use in trying to do less, but that the committee does not feel justified in recommending more.

If the Council decides to go ahead the money would come out of the Reconstruction and Advance Fund.

We Congratulate Missouri

WE CONGRATULATE the diocese of Missouri on electing a woman a deputy to the General Convention. There is a great saying which asserts that judgment begins in the house of God. The Church is often quick to point out the wrongs of others but the fact that no woman has ever represented her diocese at Convention is an injustice at the very heart of the Church. Anyone who has attended a Convention has been struck by the inequity, the anomaly, not to say anachronism of this fact.

The Rev. Clifford Stanley of St. Louis, in nominating Mrs. Randolph Dyer (WITNESS, Feb. 21) presented sound reasons for doing so, which we share. In the first place it is proverbial that woman bear the lion's share of the burden of Church work. It is obviously wrong that they have no representation in the highest council of the Church. Then too, in our country, as in most democratic countries, women have every right of citizenship and may be elected to their legislative assemblies. Yet in the Protestant Episcopal Church women do not participate in General Convention and so are condemned to a second class citizenship. There is a third consideration which is in a class apart. Christ died for all. There are no second class children of God.

The practical problem is the interpretation of the word "laymen" in article one, section 4, of the Church constitution. Some hold that this word applies to women as well as men. Perhaps a ruling on this point will be sufficient to admit a woman. Perhaps a new constitutional provision is necessary. But neither of these will be made without some action to raise the issue. Missouri has raised the issue and has done so by giving to Mrs. Dyer the largest vote received by its lay delegation.

We congratulate Missouri and in doing so would suggest that other dioceses, still to meet in convention, might well follow the example.

"QUOTES"

WOMEN'S work being directly concerned with persons more than with things, they are likely to feel the importance of human as against material values, to consider the effect of events and actions on persons rather than on possessions. This tends to make them more liberal in economic matters than are men, for men, being breadwinners, are suspicious of and on the defensive against anything that may hurt business and so jeopardize their livelihood.

Let Dead Rest in Peace

SURELY the relatives of many of those who gave their lives in the war must have been shocked by the announcement in an Associated Press dispatch that the army had completed plans for bringing home America's world war dead beginning in April if Congressional authorization is granted. Our Christian faith tells us that those who were killed are not dead but live on released from the limitations of the physical. They cast off their earthly bodies as they need them no longer. As St. Paul said, "It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body."

We cannot bring the spirit of a loved one who has died closer to us by bringing his body home. Think of him. If he died and was buried in the place where he fell fighting for freedom, would he want his family to have his body returned?—even to the most beautiful of cemeteries hallowed by the most sacred family memories? Would he not want his body to stay with his comrades? He would not want the old wounds of grief reopened at home. He would not want any group of men to be given the gruesome task of digging up his remains and of accompanying his casket on a long sad journey that would be measured not in hours, as in the case of most funerals, but in weeks. He would not want to encourage the deception that would almost inevitably result from the fact that thousands upon thousands of bodies will never be correctly identified although in loving memory a name has been placed over the grave. He who placed it knew that he was placing a name in memory of one among many who gave his last measure of devotion in that vicinity, but he knew no more. Surely he would not want even a million dollars, let alone five hundred million dollars, to be expended to bring the bodies of the dead back to America. In view of the suffering and chaos of the past war period, would he not rather have this sum of money devoted to the urgent needs of the living, to the building of new machinery for a world of brotherhood and peace, and for reconstruction and advance that would aim to make the world a better and a happier place.

While the army has evidently made the plan, its execution depends upon Congressional authorization. Therefore we urge our readers and particularly the relatives of those who have lost loved ones in World War II, to protest this proposal to our President and to our Representatives in Congress and let them know that we want, as individuals, as families, and as a nation, to set our sights on the future and not on the past.

A Capital Investment

BEFORE we make up our minds how deeply to dig into our resources to put the Reconstruction and Advance Fund over the top, it should be borne in mind that this is in reality a capital investment we are asked to make. That is to say, the fund is being raised not to support existing work, but rather to provide tools and equipment for an invigorated and intensified post-war program. Some of the fund will be used to rebuild churches, schools and hospitals in the areas devastated by war, and some of it will provide equipment for an expanded program in areas opened up and made more urgent by the war. Nor should we overlook the fact that ten per cent of this fund is to be given to the World Council of Churches for relief work in Europe and Asia. The need for this fund becomes more vivid if we imagine what our predicament might have been had the war come to America, wiping out not only our parish properties but our homes and places of work. It would be mighty reassuring to have fellow Christians in the more fortunate areas come to our aid in the rehabilitating of our religious institutions. Perhaps such a thought makes us thankful that our homes and factories and parish churches were spared! Perhaps such a thought will suggest participation in the fund as a thank offering to God!

Small change will not make possible this rehabilitation. During the war we spent without the batting of an eyelash over a hundred millions of dollars for each of our mighty battleships. We did not quibble about the cost because we knew we had to win the war. Now we are building for peace. Now, as never before, is the time to make the Church's witness to Christ as prince of peace as potent and compelling as it is humanly possible for us to make it. Again, small change will not accomplish a worthy witness. Taxes are heavy and will continue to be heavy. Instead of feeling sorry for ourselves,—after all, one does not pay taxes unless one has income or resources upon which to pay,—it is more becoming the Christian to express his gratitude (if not for the end of the war or for the return of one's sons from the war) that he has something upon which to pay taxes! Therefore taxes will hardly deter the true Christian. Because he loves his Lord, and because he knows it is within the power of the Christian fellowship to turn this world into a brotherhood of friendly nations, he will accept the challenge of this fund and make his offering with heroic and sacrificial generosity.

Church and National Sovereignty

by Stringfellow Barr

President of St. John's College

IN OUR country certainly in this century, the sons of Martha have outnumbered the sons of Mary. We have tended to substitute social reform plus a little nostalgic aestheticism for devotion, contemplation, and understanding. We have substituted humanitarianism for the love of God. I am aware that the Catholic, whether Roman or Anglo-Catholic, calls this degradation of Christianity an effect of Protestantism, although it might as well be called its cause. Perhaps it might better be called its cause in view of the extent to which Roman Catholicism in this country is afflicted by the same disease and tends to substitute moralizing and legalizing for contemplation and prayer, wherever it gets half a chance.

Martha, the good housekeeper, has won out. Given her victory, a Christian tends to be chary of offering his fellow-Christians a program of political reform, particularly if such a program lays any claim to being the sole program possible for a Christian, and most particularly if it claims to produce a Utopia as a substitute for heaven. But there may be one political program today for which a Christian would find it hard to evade responsibility. Those Christians who are also American citizens find themselves today in a political position not easy to defend. They find themselves part of the most powerful organization in the world, and indeed the most powerful which human history records, the United States of America. This organization represents only a fraction of a huge human community into which the speed of modern communication and the speed of modern transportation have irrevocably plunged it. That painful question, "Who is my neighbor?", has to be answered all over again, now that the road that used to go only down to Jericho, girdles the whole globe.

Yet the Christian who is also a citizen of the United States of America finds that the powerful organization to which he owes political obedience and for whose decisions he as a citizen stands in part responsible, now reserves the right in the last analysis to use violence against any other fraction of the human community with which it may fail to find itself in agreement. It is true that this frightening sum of power which is called the United States has entered a league to promote peace. But to date it has shown little willingness to surrender its "sovereignty." The Christian must reflect that the guarantee of sovereignty in the UNO constitution is, quite badly, our announcement as Americans that we are prepared to use violence on other groups, in the human community which we now inhabit. That we so understand it, is clear from the fact that we are steadily engaged in building up a stockpile of atomic bombs. And the stockpile is so understood by others.

The reader may object that our American forefathers, including those who professed Christ, also insisted on sovereignty and also maintained armies and navies, even though they possessed no weapons as powerful as those we are steadily piling up. But until recently the problems of time and space made it wellnigh impossible for our nation and other nations to set up a common government, capable of preventing violence and war throughout its jurisdiction. The Christian sorrowfully accepted war as being something which could not always be avoided. At Philadelphia we set up a common Federal government for ourselves and our neighbors—in what was still on the map a pretty small neighborhood, but about the most we could hope to get under one government. And it is a troubling thought that in terms of the time it took to get from place to place nearly any one of the thirteen states was larger than the inhabited globe is today.

Ah, but they had a common language, a common background of law, a common Christian tradition. The world today has many tongues, many legal systems, many religions. It is a "community" in which so much is not held in common. That is indeed the case, and it is a terrible fact. But can it exonerate us from trying to find a way? Can we as Christians cheerfully accept a political organization of the world in which the sovereign state we live under, the most powerful in the world and therefore the most responsible, reserves the right to make war? I doubt it.

I AM NOT saying that if the American people would federate with all or even with many of the other peoples now reserving the right to settle their disputes by killing, we would have a heaven on earth. I am not even saying that our duty to help set up a common government, that we may live lawfully and not lawlessly with our neighbors, is our highest duty as Christians. I can imagine no political program, no matter how worldwide, no matter how wise, that could be the highest duty of men for whom this earth can furnish only room for pilgrimage. I am merely trying to say something more important about world government than that it furnishes our only hope of saving our hides. I can hardly say anything truer about it, since no existing government, including our own, is any longer capable of affording more than modest protection to its citizens—that is, of meeting the most rudimentary obligation of government. Senator Tydings of Maryland says he doesn't care about national sovereignty; he wants to save his hide. Politically, he is of course correct in pointing out that we are unlikely to save both. But a Christian cannot afford to be too concerned about his hide. There are many situations in which he cannot even afford to be too concerned about the hides of his wife and children. For a Christian it is more important that he should not find himself conspiring with his immediate neighbors to kill, if necessary, those who live only a little further off. I fear that is what we who are both Christians and American citizens are doing at this moment. That we are doing it unhappily, confusedly, and blunderingly could mean at best that we have not done those things which we ought to have done, and there is no health in us. Sins of omission have always hitherto been accounted sins. Even a court of law may call them criminal negligence.

They are the favorite political sins of American Christians. We do not usually plan to seize territory, although we have been doing it these past few months: we already have so much. But we habitually do little to help protect the territory of those who have less than we. The rich have little need to turn to burglarly or assassination. All they need to do in order to injure others is to do nothing.

The British have made it clear that a way must be found to set up a common government among now sovereign peoples. But the British are now, compared to us, weak and helpless. If the American people continue to insist on the sovereign right to make war—a right which they pretty well have to insist on unless a common international government is set up to keep the peace—then, precisely because they are strongest, those most able to substitute law for violence will have chosen violence. Can those of us Christians who happen to be Americans participate in that choice? Should not the Church solemnly raise that question?

New Presiding Bishop and 281

by Harry Longley

Rector of St. John's, Charleston, W. Va.

THE election of a new Presiding Bishop at the coming General Convention makes pertinent some thinking about the work of the departments and divisions of the National Council at the headquarters of the Church at 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City. In this article I make bold to express some suggestions and opinions which, I hope, will arouse discussion. I believe that I speak for many others in the Church who feel as I do.

In my opinion, the directors of all the departments as well as the executive secretaries of all the divisions included in the departments of the National Council, and the officers of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America should resign their offices before the election of a new Presiding Bishop. This is perhaps a radical suggestion but I make it thoughtfully. The new Presiding Bishop ought to be given a free hand in reorganizing 281. He should be free to choose his own fellow workers, — with whom he will share responsibility for the work at 281.

Why do I make this suggestion? The various departments and divisions at 281 Fourth Avenue are established to aid the Presiding Bishop and The National Council in "the unification, development and prosecution of the missionary, educational, and social work of the Church of which work the Presiding Bishop shall be the executive head." However, belief is widespread in the Church that the divisions and departments set-up to accomplish these ends are now failing to accomplish them adequately. I have on my desk letters from all parts of the nation which indicate that there is much murmuring about 281. It is evident that 281, as it now is, has lost the confidence of the Church as a whole.

It is a matter of common knowledge that the division of Christian education was under fire at the last General Convention and that adverse criticism of it has not now subsided. The same sort of criticism is abroad in relation to the division of Christian social relations. It has been said that "the worst effects of war come from what it does to persons, and the Church needs to work in that area above all others, in creating love instead of hatred, fellowship across national, social, racial, ecclesiastical barriers." A chief complaint is that the division of Christian social relations studiously avoids this area in any vital sense. It is concerned almost altogether in the fields of social service institutions,—a 19th century concern in the 20th century.

THE department of promotion has been under its present head for only two years. When its director took office he inherited much of evil from the past. The task of this department is to promote and coordinate the work of the Church. It should weld the many parts of the Church into a mighty whole. In order to do this, it is obvious that it should have constant intimate relationship with key clergymen and key laymen in the various dioceses and missionary districts. It is clearly evident that the new director when he came into office two years ago immediately recognized this necessity and placed assistants in various sections of the nation in order to work intimately with people everywhere. If this program could be carried forward without hindrence or penny pinching it should succeed. However it is indicated plainly that something is holding it back from the accomplishment of its purpose. So here also there seems to be ground for complaint.

In short, where there is smoke, there is fire. There is smoke at 281. The headquarters of the Church need an airing. The house smells of a musty past. It is haunted by unpleasant ghosts. Even as I write this a letter comes in the mail which contains the paragraph (I omit names) "Blank of the National Council told me confidentially that the division of Christian education would welcome specific suggestions from the field. I feel that this is our opportunity as a province to make concrete suggestions to 281 for some real help." The words "confidentially" and "for some real help" are typical of much that is written constantly in relation to 281. Instead of something clear and straightforward, there is a hush-hush character to it all. There is even talk about the staff at 281 being a powerful and self-perpetuating bureaucracy. In any event it does not now inspire the confidence of the Church nor does it have the cooperation of the whole Church in the accomplishment of its work.

I believe therefore that it all adds up to giving opportunity to the new Presiding Bishop to make a new start with a 281 of his own choosing and making. Our canons, as I have said, provide that the Presiding Bishop shall be the executive head of the work carried on at 281. Nothing and no one should be allowed to stand in the way of his exercising his executive office to the full degree of its powers.

May we, as a Church, elect the best available man as Presiding Bishop. May we then make it possible for him to choose the best available persons as his fellow workers. The times cry out for greatness. The Church can use it at 281.

For Church School Teachers

By WILLIAM GRIME

OUR 1940 Hymnal has included a few new hymns for children. For this we are grateful to the commission. But as yet we have not enough hymns suitable for small children. This applies to our junior departments but especially to our primary departments. It is stupid for us to keep pushing all adult hymns on these children. One sometimes wishes words could be written within the understanding of these age groups, to such well-known tunes as "Rejoice Ye Pure in Heart." Then when our children come into the adult congregation they would know these tunes and would need only to learn new words. Anyone who has worked with these groups for years knows their hymns need to be simple, poetic, rhythmic and rich in non-complicated melody. Here is a hymn which has found favor in many schools. It was published in Children's Religion with the result that our Methodist and Presbyterian brethren have asked to print several thousand copies of it.

CHILDREN WHO LIVE ACROSS THE SEA

Children who live across the sea;
Whate'er your race or color be;
Let us together sing our praise
To God our Father all our days.

Children who pray across the sea;
Whate'er your race or color be;
Let us together kneel and say
Our Father, bless each one today.

Children who work across the sea;
Whate'er your race or color be;
Let us together try to make
A better world for Jesus' sake. Amen.

Here also is a carol which has been used in many a Christmas festival.

THE ANIMAL'S CHRISTMAS CAROL

The night when Christ was born,
In the stable on the morn,
All the animals heard the baby coo,
And offered their praises, too.

The rooster first did see
Jesus on his mother's knee,
So he raised his voice in cock-a-doodle-doo,
And offered his praises, too.

FOR LENTEN DISCUSSION

EACH week during Lent we will present a number of questions based on articles featured in the series: Issues Before General Convention. Rectors or other discussion leaders we hope will find them helpful but we suggest that they add to them or make up their own questions. We add that authors are alone responsible for their contributions, the views expressed not necessarily being those of the editors.

DR. LONGLEY'S ARTICLE

1. Should the executives at national headquarters resign when a new Presiding Bishop is elected, just as a cabinet resigns when a new president is elected?
2. Do you agree that the divisions at national headquarters are failing to fulfill their tasks adequately?
3. Does your parish get help from the divisions of religious education, social service, promotion, etc.?
4. What do you consider to be the task of national headquarters in relationship to your parish? Is it being done?
5. Do you think a new start should be made at national headquarters?

DR. BARR'S ARTICLE

1. Should U. S. surrender sovereignty and lead in the establishment of a world state?
2. Do you think U. S. is a threat to world peace?
3. Could there be a UNO unless affiliated nations were guaranteed sovereignty?
4. Many contend that nations necessarily must start with a federation of sovereign states (UNO) and go forward to a world state? Do you agree or do you think the UNO will fail because all member-nations insist on sovereignty and therefore the right to use violence on others?
5. Is the UNO the beginning of the substitution of law for violence? What if anything could be substituted for the UNO today?

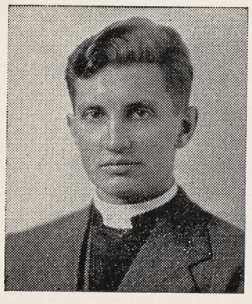
The cow was next to find
The dear babe was, oh, so kind,
So she gave her loudest moo, moo, moo
And offered her praises, too.

The dove her love did send
To this child, the children's friend,
So she sang her sweetest coo, coo, coo,
And offered her praises, too.



The lamb was last to come
To the cradle of God's son.
So she baa, baa, baaed the best she knew
And offered her praises, too.

Dramatic Arts and Religion

By
WILLIAM B. SPOFFORD, JR.

BY AND LARGE the Hollywood adaption of Charles Jackson's startling novel, The Lost Weekend, is faithful, true and equally startling. There is no doubt that it is an important picture which should be seen by all pastors. Thanks to the tremendous publicity build-up everyone knows by now that the picture is concerned with an alcoholic—Don Birnam—who, because of a frustrated desire to be a fine writer, has come to depend upon the "glass crutch." As an alcoholic, he, like 750,000 other Americans, is the victim of one of our greatest and most devastating social diseases.

While the film is dealing with the terrifying five-day bender it is truly great from every standpoint. Without hysteria or dramatics, except for those which lie inherent in the situation it traces each minute of the lost weekend from the moment that Birnam's brother pours the contents of his last bottle down the drain to the time when, torn by self-hatred and self-disgust, he is ready to blast a bullet into his head. Between those two actions, Birnam lies, cheats and steals; plays the clown and acts the fool; and is driven from one mad action to another by his overwhelming compulsion to get a drink. During the course of the five days he alternates between the false exultation of drunkenness and the throbbing, painful, intense dejection of hang-overs and his continual search for some more alcohol leads him on a six-mile hike up Third Avenue and into the alcoholic ward of the city hospital.

The scene laid in the ward is without doubt the most horrible that I have ever seen in the movies. There, amidst other victims suffering from the D.T.'s and watched over by a cynical and unsympathetic male nurse, Birnam's plight is shown with its true social significance—and its true religious significance—standing out clear, bold and naked: here is a human being, the crown of creation, being turned into worse than an animal by drink. Later, when the little animals of the D.T.'s appear to Birnam, the impression is reinforced.

The ending of the film, however, is false: it finds Birnam symbolically dropping his lighted cigarette into a shot of rye. As far as I could see there was no earthly reason why he should stop drinking. In the film his reformation is achieved because his girl tells him that he is not a failure; that he will be able to write "the great American novel." But it is apparent he is a failure and, certainly, his values and his neurotic compulsion to drink have not been changed by his fiancee's statement. The bullet in the brain—or yet another lost weekend—would have been a more fitting ending. Or perhaps the picture could have shown Birnam on his way to the psychiatrist's office. The way the film left it the dilemma was unresolved. I am certain that Birnam is still an addictive drinker, madly stalking the bistros of Third Avenue in search of a "spot of the creature."

All the persons concerned with The Lost Weekend deserve the highest plaudits. Charles Brackett and Billy Wilder, the producer and director, have made an honest and courageous picture. The acting honors, of course, go to Ray Milland who has a holiday with the role of Don Birnam but he is most ably supported by Jane Wyman as his fiancee, Philip Terry as his disturbed brother, Howard De Silva as Nat, Birnam's favorite bartender and confidant, and Frank Faylen as Bim, the male-nurse in the alcoholic ward. Together, they have made both a fictional and documentary picture which graphically presents our culture with a very real challenge. The Lost Weekend is not a picture for children but everyone fourteen or over should make it required homework.

President Truman to Address Federal Council Meeting

Many Postwar Problems Will Be Presented At a Special Meeting by Notable Speakers

Edited by Sara Dill

Columbus, O.: — President Truman will address a plenary session of the Federal Council of Churches, holding a special meeting here March 5-7.

Some 500 church leaders, representing 25 constituent denominations, will be present at the meeting, which has been called to survey the program of the churches with relation to post-war problems. Topics to be dealt with are community tensions, returning service personnel, world order, evangelism, and foreign relief.

The report on the UNO General Assembly will be made by John Foster Dulles, consultant to the U.S. delegation. Samuel McCrea Cavert, general secretary of the Federal Council, will discuss the Geneva meeting of the World Council.

Also scheduled to talk is Congressman Walter Judd, of Minnesota, former medical missionary to China. David Sarnoff, president of the Radio Corporation of America, will address a dinner sponsored by the radio department of the Federal Council.

Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam of New York, president of the Federal Council, will preside at the three-day sessions.

Veterans Hospitals

New York: — The Rev. Crawford Brown, chief of chaplains in the veterans administration, has revealed that there are at present 81 full time chaplains serving sick and wounded servicemen. He expects to have 212 in the near future. There are 98 veterans hospitals and the patients are 64% Protestant. It is planned to have one chaplain in each hospital of 150 beds or more and in the larger hospitals to have one chaplain for each 500 patients. The quota of chaplains for the Episcopal Church is six and it is already filled.

Seminary Offerings

New Haven, Conn.: — Seminaries received $83,253 from the offerings taken in 2,135 parishes last year. In 1944 the amount was $50,983 and in 1943, $47,745, according to Dean Rose of Berkeley, chairman of the committee. The breakdown:

	1943	1944	1945
Cambridge	$3,125	$3,541	$6,539
Berkeley	792	2,002	3,595
General	14,614	17,064	21,152
Philadelphia	3,770	3,246	5,580
Virginia	4,012	7,549	14,560
Sewanee	9,967	952	1,531
Bishop Payne	582	1,410	2,128
Seabury-Western	2,648	3,890	9,258

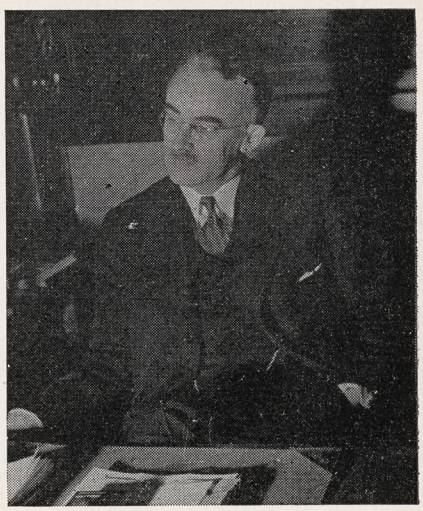
Chester Celebration

Chester, Pa.:—St. Paul's here celebrated its 243rd anniversary recently with a service of thanksgiving for the life and ministry of the late Bishop Taitt, rector of 36 years.

Quiet Day

Ardmore, Pa.: — Bishop Oliver Hart conducted a pre-Lent quiet day for the clergy of Pennsylvania on Feb. 19th at St. Mary's here.



Bishops in Birmingham

Birmingham, Ala.: — Noonday preachers in Lent at the Advent here are all bishops: Bishop Clingman of Kentucky, Bishop Hobson of Southern Ohio, Bishop Carruthers of South Carolina, Bishop Keeler of Minnesota, Bishop Wright of East Carolina, Bishop Scarlett of Missouri, Bishop Carpenter of Alabama. They are also to preach on Tuesday evenings at union services of Episcopal parishes, held at the various churches.

Veterans at Union

New York:—There are 120 ex-servicemen at Union out of a total student body of 453. Among these veterans are sixty former chaplains who are taking both refresher and graduate courses in order to be more adequately prepared for their work when they return to the active ministry. Nearly all of these men saw overseas duty where they were chiefly occupied with the practical and urgent problems of their men. Because they had limited access to books and no opportunity for study, they now feel deeply in need of a period of concentrated study in order to return to an effective ministry.

Among these veterans there are also men in this group who had finished their college work, fully expecting to begin their study for the ministry, but with the outbreak of war, they volunteered for combat duty and served as pilots, bombardiers, engineers, sailors and infantrymen. Others who have just enrolled at the Seminary to prepare for the ministry were engaged in various professions and occupations and turned to this profession as a result of their war experience. Before the war they were engaged in law, dramatics, journalism, industry and social work.

The Rev. Samuel McC. Cavert will tell of conditions in Europe at the meeting of the Federal Council

Preaches at Tuskegee

Birmingham, Ala.: — The Rev. William Marmion, rector of St. Mary's, here, was the preacher on February 17 at Tuskegee Institute. He said that "if people in the South, where most of the Negroes live, do not lend a hand (in developing better race relations) people from other sections of the country through federal legislation will force us to it."

Services for Men

Boston:—It is an old Massachusetts custom: on Washington's Birthday the laymen attend early service, followed by breakfast and an address, in the center appointed for the area in which each parish is located. This year there were twelve centers, chosen by the central council of the Church Service League men's division, where the program and the fostering of attendance was under the care of the special chairman of the area. Meeting places and guest speakers were: Attleboro, All Saints', Prof. Frederick W. Holmes, head of the men's division; Boston, Emmanuel, the Rev. Robert G. Metters, the new rector; Brockton, St. Paul's, Robert E. Huntley, area chairman; Braintree, Emmanuel, Seward F. French, assistant director of the Seamen's Club of Boston; Fall River, St. James's, the Rev. Lex Souter, Congregationalist; Hyde Park, Christ Church, Carl Ferguson, chief chemist of the department of public health; Ipswich, the Ascension, the Rev. Richard S. M. Emrich of Episcopal Theological School; Lynn, St. Stephen's, the Rev. Charles W. F. Smith, new rector of St. Andrew's Church, Wellesley; Lowell, St. John's, the Rev. David R. Hunter, executive secretary of the department of religious education; Medford, Grace Church, Chaplain Raymond S. Hall, director of the Seamen's Club of Boston; Newton, Grace Church, Dr. Robert Fleming, psychiatrist; New Bedford, Grace Church, the Rev. Arthur H. Richardson, headmaster of the Brent School, Baguio, Philippine Islands.

Busy Committee

Detroit:—When Mrs. Harold Kelleran of New Berlin, N. Y., and the Rev. John B. Fort of Springfield, Mass., went to Michigan to survey youth work for the Presiding Bishop, they discovered that the department of religious education has set up a schedule that kept them stepping. There were conferences with Bishop Creighton and members of the diocesan staff; the Rev. Sheldon T. Harbach of Dayton, chairman of youth work in the province; the executive committee of the juniors of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew; diocesan youth council; division of young people's work; division of girl's work; executive committee of the GFS, and also present and former youth leaders in the diocese. Then they met with the local clericus and also with the clergy of the Flint area and the Saginaw Valley area. There were also a number of services just for good measure.

Family Confirmed

Oshkosh, Wis.: — Last May, Angelo, recently invalided home after service in the Pacific, and Mary, both brought up in churches other than the Episcopal, came to the rector of Trinity Church, the Rev. Earle G. Lier, to be married. Since Mary had not been baptized, it was explained to them that Christian marriage presupposes allegiance to Christ and membership in his Church. After proper instruction Mary received the sacrament of baptism. Soon they were married. Within a month after the nuptials Angelo's two brothers and two sisters also confessed their faith by receiving baptism. But, of course, the entrance rite does not complete the ideal of Christian fellowship in the Church. Therefore, after further instruction, the strengthening rite of Confirmation must follow. On Sexagesima Sunday, February 24, Lier presented the entire family, except mother who is already confirmed, to Bishop Sturtevant; Angelo and his father Nicholas received from the Greek Orthodox Communion, and Mary, Jeanette, Marjorie and William were confirmed. Thus the entire Bouras family, eight strong, came into the full fellowship of the Church.

Bishop of Liberia

New York: — Bishop Bravid W. Harris of Liberia, and Mrs. Harris, arrived by plane in New York February 17. The Bishop has spent the past five months in studying his jurisdiction and reaching conclusions as to its needs and opportunities. He wants now to confer with Church officials here concerning present and future policies, and the development of a long-range program of Church expansion.

Bishop Harris said that one of the very special needs he sees is a corps of native clergy, younger men who can do really hard work both in coastal regions and in the interior. The Bishop sees the need too, for training both teachers and nurses.—Liberian natives, — trained in the republic.

He said that a small beginning is being made, starting next May, whereby six men will be placed under the supervision of the Rev. S. B. Yudesie, to start a training which it is hoped will lead ultimately to the ministry. All of the men have had high school training, and some still more. They will study under direction of the Bishop and Mr. Yudesie, getting the bases of theology, and what academic training is needed to supplement what they already have. Bishop Harris is very hopeful for the success of this plan, but regards it as merely a beginning.

Ask Representation

Abilene, Texas: — The convocation of the district of North Texas has asked General Convention to pass canons so as to insure the districts of representation on the National Council. They ask for at least one layman, one presbyter and one bishop. It was pointed out that not a single member from a missionary district is on the present Council although this body governs the districts.

It was reported that all fields in North Texas are soon to be adequately staffed for the first time in over two years with the coming of Hartford: — Noonday preachers at Christ Church Cathedral here are Bishop Walter H. Gray of Connecticut; the Rev. Dudley S. Stark of Chicago; the Rev. Louis W. Pitt of New York; Bishop Dallas of New Hampshire; the Rev. Arthur L. Washburn of Providence; the Rev. Roscoe T. Foust of New York; Dean Lichtenberger of Newark; Bishop Pardue of Pittsburgh; Bishop Lawrence of Western Massachusetts; Bishop Budlong of Connecticut.

Chaplains Return

Washington: — A total of 2,957 army chaplains have returned to civilian life since September, according to the office of the chief of chaplains.

Millions Attend

Columbus, Ohio (RNS): — Although its task has increased during recent years, religious education has more opportunities today than ever before, according to a report of the committee on the study of Christian education made to the annual convention here of the International Council of Religious Education.

Read by Paul Vieth of Yale University the report stated that this trend is due to the fact that more types of religious education ventures are now fostered by the churches. It also pointed out that there had been no abnormal decrease in Sunday school enrollment. At present there are about 21,500,000 pupils enrolled in Sunday schools, the report states.

West Coast Meetings

New York:—The Presiding Bishop and heads of all departments and divisions of the National Council are to meet with bishops of the eighth province and heads of diocesan departments before Easter. The first will be held in Portland, Oregon, March 27-28, followed by a similar meeting in San Francisco, April 2-3.

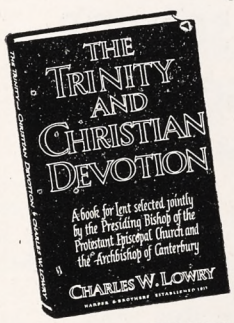
Bishop Resigns

New York: — Bishop Charles S. Reifsnider, former bishop of North Kwanto, Japan, and president of St. Paul's University, has resigned. Since the war he has been bishop in charge of non-diocesan Japanese work in the United States. He will be 71 next November. The resignation will be acted upon at the meeting of the House of Bishops at General Convention.

Overseas Broadcasts

New York: — Pastor Martin Niemoeller of Germany is to broadcast from Geneva, Switzerland, on March 2 on the NBC Religion in the News program, featured on Saturday evenings. The following week the guest speaker will be Archbishop Geoffrey F. Fisher of Canterbury, broadcasting from London.

Lenten Services



Philadelphia:—Noonday services are being held at St. Stephen's here for the 55th consecutive year. Preachers this year are Bishop Hart, the Rev. Samuel Shoemaker of New York, the Rev. J. R. Hart of Valley Forge, the Rev. W. D. Dunphy of Philadelphia, the Rev. Leonard Rasmusson of Philadelphia, the Rev. W. H. Aulenbach of Germantown, the Rev. Clarence Brickman, chaplain of the Brotherhood of St.

Lenten Books to Heal and Strengthen the Spirit

The Presiding Bishop's Book For Lent 1946

THE TRINITY AND CHRISTIAN DEVOTION

Charles W. Lowry

Here is a deeply devotional treatment of one of the central doctrines of the Christian faith. In five telling and closely-reasoned chapters, the concept of the Trinity is revealed as a mark of worship, a symbol of religious experience. William Temple, late Archbishop of Canterbury, selected this book before his death to be the Lenten Book for 1946 in Britain. H. St. George Tucker then concurred in making it the Presiding Bishop's Book for Lent 1946 in the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States. Dr. Lowry is Rector of all Saints' Church, Chevy Chase, Washington, D. C. $1.50

THOSE OF THE WAY

By Willard L. Sperry. Another book especially suitable to the season. One meditation for each week of the penitential season, in which various aspects of following in "The Way" are illuminated by the well-known dean of the Harvard Divinity School. On the Lenten Reading List for 1946. $1.50

Urge United Work

Atlantic City, N. J. (RNS):—The committee on policy and program, division of foreign missions, of the Methodist Church meeting here approved a united approach to the Japanese missionary problem by 30 different denominations. Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam, of New York City, who presided, said the program represents a "complete reversal" of the pre-war situation in Japan. He said that the 30 denominations which will work together represent four-fifths of all missionary work being carried on in Japan.

While many details are yet to be worked out, Bishop Oxnam said, the main program will eliminate overlapping of effort by the various denominations.

A similar coordinated program will be conducted in Burma, he reported.

A Junior Church

Montreal (RNS):—The traditional Sunday school will be replaced by a junior church in an experiment to be conducted by the Anglican Church of St. Matthias from now until the end of May. If the results justify it, the change may become permanent. Members of the junior church will choose their own officers and conduct their own service. An illustrated address, following a plan of Bible and Prayer Book instruction, will form the teaching part of the service.

Honored by Workers

London (wireless to RNS):—The Workers Educational Association has announced plans for a new headquarters building to be known as Temple House in honor of the late Archbishop William Temple. He was president of the Association from 1908 to 1924.

Build New Church

Indianapolis, Ind.:—Ground was broken February 10 for the new St. Paul's, to cost $300,000. It is expected to be ready in about a year. The Rev. William Burrows has been rector for many years.

First Since War

Munich: — Bishop Larned, in charge of American Churches in Europe, held a confirmation in this former center of Naziism. The service was held in the chapel of the military government for Bavaria building. Those confirmed were Mrs. Edward Harrison, wife of Chaplain Harrison, and First Lt. George Pugh. Four Episcopal chaplains participated: Hillis Duggins, Alvin Bullen, Gordon Hutchins, Edward Harrison.

Pre-Lenten Reading

WHERE ART THOU?
By C. Avery Mason

In these six constructive essays, the Bishop Coadjutor of Dallas makes an appeal to laymen to find in Christianity a solution to modern problems. He emphasizes the necessity for worship, prayer, stewardship, vocation and intimate contact with God and Christ. "An easily read and suggestive volume," writes Church Management. $1.00

HIS BODY THE CHURCH
By W. Norman Pittenger

The nature of the Church and its ministry is the subject of this important book. In an entirely new way, the author states the old truth of the one, holy, catholic and apostolic Church. "Catholic faith and practice here are set forth in a fashion both aggressive and academically adroit." — The Living Church. $2.50

PRAYER AND THE SERVICE OF GOD
By Daniel T. Jenkins

"This is the finest brief volume on prayer that we have read in many a year," writes The Southern Churchman of this book for understanding what prayer is and does. Those who find prayer difficult in these days will gain from this book a new understanding of the value of prayer in the modern world. $1.50

Honor Chaplains

Philadelphia: — An interfaith chapel will be erected at Grace Baptist Temple here to commemorate the sacrifice of the four Army chaplains who gave their lives for their shipmates on the stricken transport Dorchester on Feb. 3, 1943. In recognition of the fact that the four chaplains represented the three major faiths, the new chapel will be designed in such a manner that Catholics, Protestants and Jews may enter through the same door and worship in the traditions of their faiths at separate altars. Behind the altars of the "Chapel of the Four Chaplains" will be a mural depicting the cross, the star of David, and tablets of the law.

The four chaplains were Lt. Clark V. Poling, of Schenectady, N. Y., son of Daniel Poling, editor of the Christian Herald; Lt. John P. Washington, Newark, N. J.; Lt. Alexander D. Goode, Washington, D. C.; and Lt. George L. Fox, Chicopee Falls, Mass. Lieutenants Poling and Fox were Protestants, Lt. Washington was a Roman Catholic, and Lt. Goode was a Jew.

According to affidavits of the Dorchester survivors, the four chaplains went among troops on the torpedoed transport, calming their fears, and handing out lifebelts, removing their own when no more remained and giving them to others. As the ship sank, the four chaplains were seen linked arm in arm, their voices raised in prayer.

Help from Australia

London (wireless to RNS):—The Rev. John Darlington, vicar of St. Mark's Church in Kensington, has received a contribution of 1,160 pounds (about $4,000) in Australian money from the congregation of St. Mark's Church in Darling Point, southwest Australia, toward rebuilding of his bombed church. He announced that a service of thanksgiving for the gift will be held at a temporary church in Tramways Hall.

Aid for Others

New York:—Ample evidence has been received by the National Council to indicate that the Material Aid program is being widely accepted, and that Church people are already contributing large quantities of food and clothing for the relief of European and Asiatic people of our sister Churches. To the middle of February, eighteen dioceses had reported sending boxes to the united Church service centers in New Windsor, Maryland, and Modesto, California. These shipments added up to a total of 203 boxes and cartons. In many parishes the work has been taken up by the Woman's Auxiliary, but in others young people's groups, Church schools and men's groups are organizing the work and enlisting the support of the whole parish.

Praise Phone Girls

Winthrop, Mass.:—"I have never gone so far as to associate telephone girls with guardian angels but I'm not ashamed to do it now," said Rev. Ralph M. Harper in St. John's Church here.

"Near midnight recently," the rector went on, "the supervisor of the Winthrop exchange called, stating that one of her girls before re-

SUPPORT THE SEMINARIES

May I emphasize the importance of the Theological Education Sunday Offering particularly at this time when so many of our service men will be entering our Seminaries, and also when the Seminaries are being called upon to provide special courses for returning Chaplains.

If they are to measure up to the demand that the situation makes upon them they will need a very much larger amount of support from the living generation, particularly in view of the fact that the income from endowments given by past generations has fallen off very materially.

I do hope every congregation in our Church will recognize the opportunity which Theological Education Sunday gives for enabling our Seminaries to supply the kind of training that we must have if the ministry of the Church is to meet the demands of the present situation.

porting for duty had noticed lights on the lower floor of the parish house while passing by and she wondered if some one had not broken in. I told her I would find out in a jiffy. Ten minutes later the supervisor again rang up, saying the girls were worrying lest I had not returned home.

"For over 31 years I have tramped the streets of the town without any fear, whatever, assuming that even if heaven's watch were temporarily relaxed a burglar would be the scorn of burglardom for holding up a parson. Now there is another reason for assurance from anxiety in the dark — guardian angels are mightily reinforced by an innumerable company of alert telephone girls."

Churches Ask Equality

Budapest (wireless to RNS):—Enactment of a new religious law to strengthen the position of minority sects was urged by a newly-organized Free Church Federation in a petition sent to the Hungarian government. The petition demanded abolition of the practice of classifying churches as "recognized," "acknowledged," and "tolerated."

Groups sponsoring the petition were Seventh-day Adventists, Baptists, Methodists, Old Catholics, Plymouth Brethren and the Salvation Army. These sects have been classed as "societies" instead of churches and placed under supervision of the ministry of the interior rather than the ministry of education.

Demands made by the minority sects include complete separation of Church and state, and abolition of state subsidies for the Presbyterian, Lutheran, Old Catholic, and other larger denominations.

It is estimated that the small sects, which are mostly of American and British origin, represent a total membership of 200,000.

AUBREY C. MAXTED
Rector at Bay City, Texas

Let me tell you folks something. Us folks out in the "provinces" have little enough opportunity to get the straight dope on things, and we are subjected to much propaganda. THE WITNESS provides us with a quotable source for the true word. But you don't give us enough of it. No, we are not kicking about what you are doing, you are doing fine—but give us more of Spofford. I've worn out two dictionaries reading your editorials, but when it comes to something that can be understood by the people—then we find we are reading Bill's stuff.

MRS. WALTER G. STOLL
Wilson, New York

We are not Episcopalians, but through a friend we were introduced to THE WITNESS. We initially subscribed to secure your San Francisco reports. We wish to tell you that we have been greatly impressed by the paper and the liberal and progressive views you have expressed. We have been particularly interested in the articles by Mr. Spofford and are delighted to have had this opportunity of becoming acquainted with the outlook and forward looking plans of another denomination than our own. Such knowledge of other denominations does much to forward Christian unity.

LESLIS B. MOSS
Director, Church Committee of Overseas Relief

The Rev. Herbert W. Prince, in his article of January 10, seems to be unaware that there is anything being done jointly by the various Church communions in the field of relief and reconstruction. Since 1939 this committee appointed jointly by the Federal Council of Churches and the Foreign Missions Conference, has continued a validating service for a panel of agencies through which the Churches have been sending their funds. More than $6,000,000 of Church money has been used in Christian program through interdenominational operation in this period. The Episcopal Church has joined in this interdenominational undertaking and has given considerable sums of money to the correlated and united program, both under the World Council of Churches for Europe and through the Church Committee for Relief in Asia for activities in that area.

ANSWER: Dr. Prince is fully aware of what is being done by the churches through the World Council and other agencies. His point was that the Episcopal Church is not doing enough and also that in Church reconstruction in foreign fields all Churches should cooperate and not continue the scandal of competition. THE WITNESS editors share this view.

H. M. RICHARDSON
Chaplain in the Navy

This is a note of sincere appreciation to THE WITNESS and its services to the chaplains returning to civilian life. I speak of chaplains in the plural for I feel that the experience I have been through is or can be typical of any and all chaplains.

When my points accumulated to a degree where I had a good idea of when I was to be released, I notified the A. & N. chaplains' commission of my date of release. I received a cordial reply that my name would be placed on a list of chaplains returning to civilian life which was sent to all of the bishops! Of all of the deflating experiences certainly this was something that made me groan. Another list of men to the bishops! What good is that? The commission had backed us to the hilt, been wonderful to us and now was letting us down! Naturally, my own bishop, being most considerate and helpful, tried his best to help me, but even bishops have only a limited number of contacts, so he recommended that I get in touch with Get-Together column. The results of your column were so surprising that I hardly had time to catch my breath. Needless to say, the parish that needed me and the parish I needed found each other. My heartfelt thanks to THE WITNESS for doing a job the commission should be doing.

CHARLES A. HIGGINS
Rector at Cape Girardeau, Mo.

The Rev. Gardiner M. Day in a recent pamphlet called "Why Unite With the Presbyterians" recognizes that any merger between the Episcopal Church and the Presbyterian Church will not mean one Church where there are now two but rather three Churches where there are now two. "It is seldom," writes Mr. Day, "that two organizations of considerable size can merge without leaving a small remnant of irreconcilables who cannot see their way to agreeing with the majority." This is one of the best reasons for postponing action on any proposals to merge the two communions that may be brought before the next General Convention. If merger cannot be brought about with the full participation of both Churches it will simply lend greater confusion to our present divisions.

An example of what happens when merger brings such a split may be seen where there have been recent mergers of relatively large Christian bodies. In my own city of 20,000 people, for example, there are four churches of a recently united communion. One might assume this number to be adequate for a city of this size, and it would have been save for groups of "irreconcilables" in the churches that merged. Since all four of the local congregations joined the united Church it is now deemed necessary to build a fifth church for the "irreconcilables." Progress on the building for the fifth congregation is well underway, and another group of "irreconcilables" from the same merger are seeking a suitable location for their building. It is only reasonable to assume that "irreconcilables" of an Episcopal-Presbyterian merger would follow a similiar procedure.

Church Leaders Hold Service To Open World Meeting

Leaders of Protestant and Orthodox Church Make Plans for World Council of Churches

By Religious News Service

Geneva (by wireless): — High-ranking leaders of Protestant and Orthodox Churches in many countries joined in common prayer here as members of the provisional committee gathered to discuss final plans for creation of the World Council of Churches which will embrace major non-Roman Churches throughout the world, representing 92 Protestant and Orthodox Communions in 33 countries.

Crowded into the historic Cathedral of St. Pierre, where Calvin preached the tenets of Protestantism four centuries ago, thousands listened to addresses by Pastor Martin Niemoeller, of the Evangelical Church of Germany; Bishop Eivind Berggrav, primate of the Norwegian State Lutheran Church; and Chester Miao of China, a delegate of the International Missionary Council.

In eloquent silence, the congregation heard Niemoeller, one-time personal prisoner of Adolf Hitler, make a confession of his country's guilt, after Geoffrey Francis Fisher, Archbishop of Canterbury had offered a prayer in which he urged the Churches of the world to tear down walls that "separate and divide."

Other leading participants were Alphons Koechlin, president of the Swiss Protestant Federation, who offered a prayer in French; Greek Archbishop Germanos of Thyateira who read a Scripture passage in Greek; and John R. Mott, honorary chairman of the International Missionary Council. Mott headed the solemn procession into the cathedral in which the plain black robes of the Swiss clergy contrasted with the colorful attire of Anglican and other prelates.

Speaking in French, Pastor Niemoeller declared that "a mountain of sin and guilt" rests on the Christians of Germany and arouses "a horror that scarcely anyone dares to face." He said the German churches have no great program to transform radically the spiritual constitution of Germany overnight, but that they will go ahead with their task of calling to repentance.

"If this seems too little," he said, "surely God's rejoicing over one repentant sinner indicates he will perform his will in his own miraculous way. He did great things through the sinner Paul who repented. He can do it again in our way, if that is his will. We can only do in loyalty and obedience what we recognize as his task for us and that is what we in Germany want to do."

Turning to the theme of world-wide cooperation by the Christian Churches, Pastor Niemoeller declared that "Christendom needs a world-wide view so as not to subside into national provinciality." He said Christian anti-Nazi resisters in Germany had realized with gratitude that they were not alone in the struggle, but had "the brotherly sympathy and intercession of Christian friends throughout the world."

Both Bishop Berggrav and Chester Miao declared that the Christians of their country also had received great spiritual support from the knowledge that Christians throughout the world prayed for them. Describing his imprisonment by the Gestapo, Bishop Berggrav related how on one occasion a peasant woman secretly brought him a bottle of milk and whispered that her husband had heard the Archbishop of Canterbury pray for Norway over a secret radio.

Miao said Christian fellowship toward China has "transcended the war, race, and nationality."

Speaking at an afternoon reception given by the Swiss churches to the World Council delegates, the Archbishop of Canterbury asserted that "the primary task of the Church is to bring to men the message and power of reconciliation." He said inclusion of Germans in the Geneva meeting should be held up to the world as an example of this truth.

The question of future relationships with Orthodox Churches is also on the agenda. At the present time, the Council is largely cut off from the larger Slavonic Churches as well as from the Roumanian Church. Protestant leaders are known to be anxious to strengthen relations with Orthodox churches.

Bishop Eivind Berggrav, primate of the Norwegian Church, speaks at the service of the World Council in Geneva

As planned, the World Council of Churches will have authority to call world conference on specific subjects as occasion requires. It will be a purely consultative body, without any power to legislate for constituent Churches or to impose limitations upon their autonomy. Its main purposes will be to facilitate common action by the Churches in matters of international interest; to promote cooperation in study; to establish relations with denominational federations of world-wide scope and other ecumenical (world Church cooperation) movements; and to promote the growth of "ecumenical consciousness" in the members of all Churches.

According to its proposed constitution, the principal authority of the World Council will be an assembly which will meet every five years, consisting of not more than 450 members, divided proportionately between the Churches of various countries. There will also be a central committee of not more than 90 members, which will serve from the beginning of the assembly meeting until the next assembly. This committee will meet normally once a year and have power to appoint its own executive committee.

The Council will be formally organized at an international assembly which will meet in August, 1948. Invitations have been received to hold this meeting in the United States, Denmark and Holland, but it is thought likely that it will meet in Europe since a number of other important conferences are to be held there in 1948, including the Lambeth Conference of Anglican bishops which will meet in London.

In a move to broaden the leadership of the Council the provisional committee elected five co-chairmen in place of the single chairman, the late Archbishop of Canterbury, William Temple. They are Archbishop Fisher of Canterbury; the Rev. Marc Boegner, president of Protestant Churches in France; Archbishop Germanos of the Greek Orthodox Church in England; Archbishop Erling Eidem of the Swedish Lutheran Church and Dr. John R. Mott, chairman of the International Missionary Council. Boegner, who is also chairman of the administrative committee, looms as a major figure among the five co-chairmen. The administrative committee consists of Bishop Bell of Chichester; the Rev. Samuel McC. Cavert of the Federal Council of Churches; the Rev. Alfonse Koechlin of Switzerland and the Rev. Henry Pitney Van Dusen, president of Union Seminary, whose article on unity is featured in this number of THE WITNESS.

MILITARY TRAINING IS OPPOSED

Washington (RNS):—Compulsory peacetime military training was vigorously opposed by representatives of six religious groups at hearings before the House military affairs committee here. Four of the spokesmen represented church youth groups. Declaring that conscription in America would encourage other nations to follow our example, Mrs. Harper Sibley, of Rochester, N. Y., president of the United Council of Church Women, stated the entire future of the UNO would be jeopardized by the adoption of conscription here.

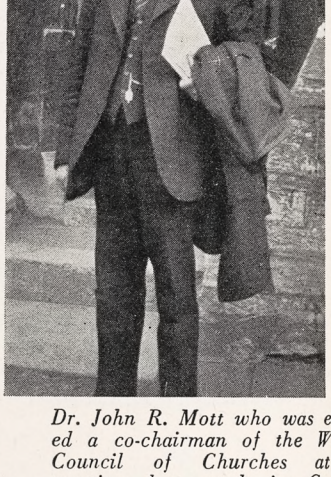
Washington: — Crewmen of a light cruiser bound for a raid on Marcus Island gather aft for a service. They are seated on one of the ship's catapults, with their feet dangling over life rafts. This assault resulted in the destruction of eighty per cent of the enemy's installations.

The picture is the last of a series of ten which have appeared on WITNESS covers, all taken in combat by Fons Iannelli who was a member of the photo unit directed by Captain Edward J. Steichen. These pictures, as we have stated, caught as words never could, something of what men went through during war which all must keep in mind as we work for a warless world.

SPECIAL LECTURERS AT BEXLEY



Gambier, Ohio:—As a part of the Lenten program, the students organization at Bexley Hall, has arranged for a series of special lectures by visiting clergymen. The Rev. E. B. Jackson of Cleveland is to speak on ministering in a housing settlement. The Rev. Stephan M. Kelker, rector at Lima, Ohio, is to speak on ministering in industry and the Rev. V. J. Peard of Mansfield, Ohio, is to speak on Alcoholics Anonymous.

EMRICH LEADS MEETING

Syracuse, N. Y.:—The Rev. Richard Emrich of the faculty of the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge, led a conference of the clergy of the diocese of Central New York on February 26-27. He gave a number of addresses on the general theme of the Church's part in rebuilding a broken civilization.

PROGRESSIVE ACTION IN MISSOURI

St. Louis:—In addition to taking action on many local matters, such as public housing, emergency housing for veterans, restaurant sanitation, state social security, and a state minimum wage law, the convention of Missouri passed resolutions on a number of national issues. A resolution was passed urging the passage of the bill providing for a permanent Fair Employment Practices Commission which would make it unlawful to discriminate in employment against properly qualified persons because of race, creed, color, national origin or ancestry. Another resolution stated that "the productive capacities of the industrial machine require a mass market, which in human terms means widespread well being and security, while the lack of such a mass market means want, unemployment and public peril" and then went on record as "endorsing the full employment act" and deploring "any weakening of its principle."

Dr. John R. Mott who was elected a co-chairman of the World Council of Churches at a meeting last week in Geneva

In regard to UNO the convention went on record as wholeheartedly supporting it and stated that churches have the responsibility of educating members on such key issues as control of the atomic bomb, trusteeships for strategic bases, and world trade. The convention also endorsed Senate bill 1717, the McMahon bill, which is considered the best one before Congress on control of the atomic bomb.

Church members have since been asked to write the Congressmen and Senators on these matters, with the secretary of social service, the Rev. Charles Wilson, sending out information which included the names of Missouri Congressmen and Senators.

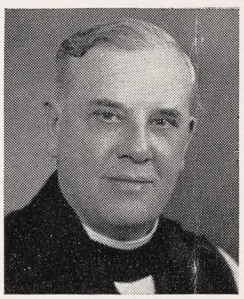
Laymen Preach to the Bishops At Meeting of Council

Society Is Formally Launched for Purpose of Issuing Tracts With a Catholic Slant

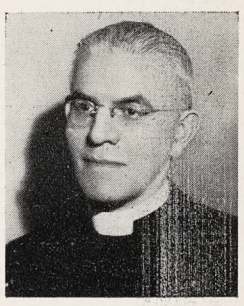
By W. B. Spofford

New York:—The press-worthy fact about the dinner which launched the National Council of Laymen on February 27 was that sixteen bishops and several hundred of the lesser clergy had to sit quietly in their "pews" while four laymen each preached good fifteen minute sermons. What percentage of the 700 persons present were laymen it was impossible to judge—an observer at the press table figured that at least half of the audience came from rectories: parsons and their wives. You could tell the parsons by their round collars: the wives because they came with the parsons.



Anyone who came expecting to hear a militantly high church line of talk were disappointed. Certainly nothing was said to indicate that this new society is to be a high-powered outfit out to capture the Episcopal Church for Anglo-Catholicism. When reference was made to the Episcopal Church it was called "the Catholic Church"; there were references to "the essentials of the Catholic Faith" and "a rule of life involving all the sacraments." Also when Clark Kuebler, the president of the organization, put in a plug for Church unity he said that "Ours is the one Church which can extend the hand of fellowship to both Catholic and Protestant" which probably meant that it is better to keep both hands in your pockets if you can't shake hands with both at the same time. But taking it as a whole, all the talks were just good sermons that set forth truths that are taken for granted these days by practically every clergyman I know. Indeed the surprising thing to me was that such distinguished laymen should talk about the Prayer Book, the Incarnation, Sin, the need of applying Christian principles to all areas of life, in a manner indicating that for them they were completely new discoveries.

Mr. Kuebler's essay took the Reinhold Niebuhr line, only simplified, which helped. He cracked at the "inevitability of progress" philosophy of a previous generation which resulted in "bland optimism and self-confidience." He next hit at "an equally unthinking cynicism and negativism" which followed, and then quite rightly came to the conclusion "that the illness which ails the world is sin or alienation from God." He then pointed out that the Prayer Book is "a truly remarkable document" and that the new society which he heads proposes to give "instruction to our people through tracts and other publications" on the truths it contains.



Mr. Richardson Wright, the editor of a mass circulation magazine, likewise revealed that he had made discoveries. Said he: "We have failed to teach the whole satisfying faith—the whole faith of the Incarnation which wove the kingdom not of this world and our everyday working, playing, familiar world about us into one inseparable piece." He then stated that when laymen "find that out they are amazed" particularly when they discover that it means that the Church should have something to say about "our present industrial unrest." Which prompts me to put in a plug for the CLID by pointing out that that organization has been saying just that, and acting on it, for nearly thirty years. He ended with a strong plea for a religious revival by calling for a "laity of firm conviction, men and women who know the rock whence they are hewn, who will defend Christ's mystical body, the Church, against weakness within and assault without."

Mr. William R. Castle, former under-secretary of state and once ambassador to Japan, said that "Any whittling away of different segments of the faith, any cowardly evasion of controversial points, any fear to defend the whole faith as expressed in the Book of Common Prayer, either as against ultra-Protestant influences or as against Romanizing influences means weakness where strength is essential. The Episcopal Church, as an independent body, came into being in England as a protest against the usurpations and errors of Rome. We never repudiated, as did Calvin, the doctrines of the Church Catholic; we only scrubbed off the excrescences which were beginning to hide the glorious truth. We must never forget that when we inveigh against the excesses of the Protestants. I am willing enough to absorb Rome, which is a branch of the Holy Catholic Church. I am not willing to be absorbed by Rome because that would be once again to assume the errors which we sloughed off 400 years ago, as well as the new errors which have since been added. Let us be ourselves always. In all our discussions, moreover, we must be infinitely charitable, since charity is of the very essence of catholicity. If our extreme evangelical, or our so-called broad church brothers sometimes forget this fact, we must never forget it. But charity never means surrender of the truth. It means rather that we must attract others through our own certainty, not by attacking their mistakes. If we can bring them to see the eternal rightness of the full Church position they will join us voluntarily."

Mr. Clifford Morehouse, like Mr. Wright, struck a social note by saying that the Church must assume the duty of embodying the teachings of Christ in a moral code "that is applicable to a world of corporations and stockholders, of unions and co-operatives, as well as of individual relations. When our clergy do preach about questions of social and industrial morality they are likely to preach to white collar congregations about the sins of labor rather than about their own shortcomings.

CHURCH IN THE NEWS: Attending the laymen's dinner were sixteen bishops including Bishop Gardner of New Jersey and Bishop Essex of Quincy. At the right is the Rev. Frank Dean Gifford, rector at Mamaroneck, N. Y., who has accepted the position as dean of the Philadelphia Divinity School, effective May first.

Before the dinner there was a long receiving line to greet the sixteen bishops, after which they filed in, Indian fashion, to take their place at the speakers table where they remained silent for the rest of the evening. The bishops present were the Presiding Bishop, Bishop Barry of Albany, Bishop Gardner of New Jersey, Bishop Wroth of Erie, Bishop Essex of Quincy, Bishop VanDyke of Vermont, Bishop Ivins of Milwaukee, Bishop Oldham of Albany, Bishop Manning of New York, Bishop Perry of Rhode Island, Bishop White of Springfield, Bishop Sturtevant of Fond du Lac, Bishop Whittemore of Western Michigan, Bishop DeWolfe of Long Island, Bishop Pardue of Pittsburgh.

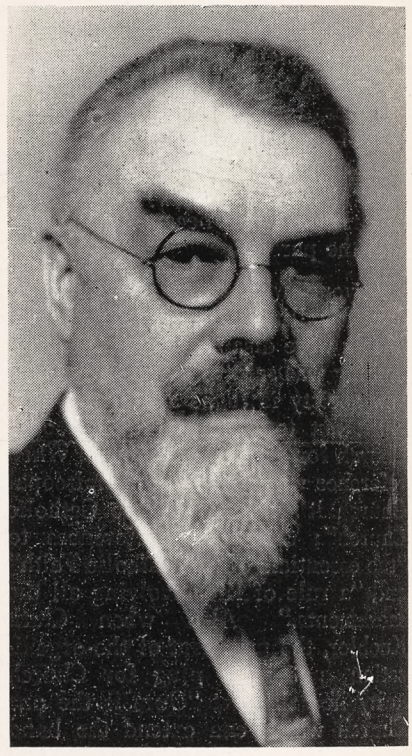
DR. WASSELL TALKS TO STUDENTS

Greenville, Miss.: — Dr. C. M. Wassell, the hero of Java, gave a series of addresses last week at St. James' Church here. He also spoke to the students of both the white and Negro high schools. He told the latter of work among Negroes in his native Arkansas, describing the formation of medical units on plantations. His talk was followed by an open forum. Considerable time was also taken when autograph books were produced and the famous doctor and former missionary signed all that were presented.

CHURCH COUNCIL PRAISES LABOR

Cincinnati:—The local council of churches last week adopted a resolution praising the American Federation of Labor for supporting world democracy by demanding the recognition of the Spanish government-in-exile and denouncing the Franco regime. "In this they should be joined by every true believer in democracy," declared the churchmen. "Since Protestant Christianity has always inspired and supported democracy we join in this request."

ADOLPH KELLER SPEAKS ON EUROPE



Berkeley, Calif.: — Prof. Adolph Keller of the University of Zurich, Switzerland, who is also on the staff of the World Council of Churches, was the headliner at a conference on religion held last week at the Pacific School of Religion. Speaking on conditions in Europe, he declared that it was not simply a geographical or social or racial entity "but presents most difficult psychological, moral and religious problems."

The speaker called Europe today the dark continent, contrasting it with the fortunate continent of America, with victory, power and wealth, optimistic belief in goodwill, ideal programs and reconstruction. "The main continental countries in Europe are coming to the end of their world," he said. "It is not simply an abominable political system which is finished, not simply happiness and health of millions of human beings, or the glory of ancient cultural centers which have come to an end, but many old cherished ideals of the European soul, revered cultural values. Not only is the whole social order disintegrating but also something in the very structure of the European mind.

"This transformation of the European consciousness has a sinister negative aspect as well as a hopeful and positive one. That man who believed in power, in the superman, in the illimited possibilities of the human race, has met his limits, his frontier line beyond which he cannot reach for the moment. A moral confusion results from this disintegration which is manifest especially in the members of the young generation. For years they were taught that wrong was right, that they had to lie, for instance, in order to save an elder brother, hidden in a cellar, from arrest by the Gestapo. The moral foundations have thus been shaken and the problem of re-education is most difficult in the present efforts toward reconstruction. The soul of millions is filled with fear and hatred or desire for revenge. These psychological and moral obstacles to peace must be known and studied in the interest of the present administrative co-operation between the allied authorities and a new class of leadership in the occupied countries. No political authority can overcome fear and revengefulness resulting from the experiences of these years."

The speaker declared that this dark and sinister aspect of the psychological and moral situation is paralleled by a glimmer of hope.

"The end of a state of mind contains also elements of a new beginning. The despair in man, in power, in success stimulates a fresh searching for higher values which can withstand even such an earthquake. The pessimism in regard to human nature and the natural goodness of men does not exclude an optimism of faith. A religious revival is no doubt manifest in the Christian world of the continent. A new Bible movement is growing and many aspects of the old divine message receive a new terrible and hopeful justification from recent historic events. History has become judgment. The question of guilt and responsibility can no longer be silenced. The continent is certainly sharing the awakening of a new world conscience and also a new confidence, not so much in a natural evolution and progress for which the atom bomb is a frightening symbol, but in the redemptive moral and spiritual forces of the gospel. Still it is night in millions of souls but a new day is dawning in the sufferings and travails of a lost generation."

Adolph Keller of Zurich tells Church conference of conditions in Europe today

EDITORIALS

The National Council

READ the heading then close your eyes and ask yourself, "What is this editorial going to be about?" Nine out of ten informed churchmen will say that we are going to write something about 281 —the official National Council of the Church— which in reality is the executive committee of General Convention between sessions. But now there is another National Council—the National Council of Churchmen. It was formally launched on February 27th with a dinner in New York, attended by distinguished churchmen and women, including twenty bishops who lined up with the officers of the organization for handshaking before the meal.

We are not concerned at the moment with the aims of this new organization — the news story (page five) will give you an idea of that. What we are concerned about is the name. Whether or not it was deliberately chosen to confuse of course we do not know. But that it does confuse is attested by the fact that the official National Council has felt obliged to warn people about it in an official publication, and the Bishop of Alabama has seen fit to warn communicants that in responding to requests for contributions to this new society they are not giving to the missionary work of the Church, as some of them apparently think.

"Do not make the mistake of thinking," writes Bishop Carpenter in his diocesan paper, "that this has anything to do with your National Council. It is regrettable that this name shall have been used by this small group, which, I understand, has for one of its aims the removal of the word "Protestant" from the official name of the Church. In Alabama we like the word Protestant because we like the strong positive emphasis which it connotes. We know that Protestant is derived from the Latin words: Pro which means 'for' and Testor 'to be a witness.' We remember our Lord's final words before his Ascension: 'Ye shall be witnesses unto me, etc.,' and we like to be reminded in the title of our Church of our duty to be witnesses for the Christ and for the freedom of the individual within his Church from any tyranny of ecclesiasticism."

We believe that churchmen and women have a perfect right to band together for any legal purpose they see fit . . . whether it is the moth-eaten one of dropping "Protestant" from the title of the Church, or the more dubious one of promoting a type of ecclesiastical and political fascism in the United States, which some contend is the real purpose of this new society. Whatever it is let them have the plain decency not to steal the official name of that body of men and women who direct the affairs of the whole Church between sessions of General Convention.

"QUOTES"

IN ADDITION to the Christian Creed of 325 A.D. the Episcopal Church believes that the public worship of God calls for order, dignity, beauty and reverence; that the possession and growth of the Holy Spirit may be as quiet as the life process in nature and not necessarily accompanied by mental or physical explosions. In matters of amusement the Church taboos no legitimate form of recreation. Temperance in all things is the guide-line, marking the true road to social happiness, physical health and spiritual growth. In government we strike a balance between authority and freedom which is true democracy. We maintain that there is no enduring conflict between modern science and the Christian faith. We honor the past, live in the present and believe in the future.

—Norman B. Quigg,
Rector at Shawnee, Oklahoma

Unequivocal and Final

WHEN we asked Dr. Van Dusen to write on unity in our Lenten series we did so partly because he is a communicant of the Episcopal Church, a minister of the Presbyterian Church, the president of the largest interdenominational seminary in Christendom. More than that, he is not only a scholar of international repute but he has a vision of the Church Universal which made his book They Found the Church There top the list of religious books in 1945 and keeps it there at the present time. Certainly it is significant that bishops of the Episcopal Church, some of whom doubtless will disagree violently with his article, made this book "must" reading for their clergy in preparing for our Reconstruction and Advance drive.

We asked him not to pull his punches. He has not done so. He urges a simple thing: that there shall be no evasion of the issue this fall in Philadelphia; no "reinterpretation" of the facts, no cloak-room (he might better have said "Union League Club") formulae which hides realities. He calls for an unequivocal and final decision on this matter of organic union with the Presbyterians. Certainly he and our Presbyterian brethren are entitled to that. If we fail, we may be sure an unequivocal and final decision will come from them. And if that happens, we agree with Dr. Van Dusen, it will be the gravest setback which the cause of Christian unity has suffered in more than a century and the blame will be placed squarely on the doorstep of the Episcopal Church.

Protestants Also Have Converts

FRONT pages of newspapers feature from time to time the conversion of conspicuous persons to the Roman Church. These prominent people coupled with skillful publicity—the Metropolitan opera programs used to carry full page advertisements listing the names of prominent converts to Rome—give the impression that there is a decided trend toward Rome. What the front pages do not publicize is the trend in the opposite direction. While klieg lights and blaring trumpets focus attention upon celebrities entering one door of the Roman Church, the lambs of Peter are scurrying from other doors in such numbers as to cause the hierarchy genuine concern.

In one Protestant parish we know, twenty-two Romanists have been married to Protestants within the past two years. This is about half the total number of marriages in that parish. Learning of this deflection we inquired among friends and found that this condition is rather general. In fact Roman losses through marriages to Protestants are so alarming in one Roman diocese that the bishop decreed that mixed marriages might take place in the church. In fairness to the bishop it should be stated that he softened this compromise by ordering the altars stripped before such irregularities.

As we contemplate this exodus certain thoughts present themselves. Protestantism can claim little credit for the exodus. We wish it might, not that we consider proselyting Romanists a proper missionary function, but because we wish there were on the part of Protestants a greater appreciation of the rock whence they were hewn. The free institutions of America are menaced less by the avowed purpose of Rome to capture this country than by Protestant indifference to its heritage.

It also occurs to us that it would be a happy day for world Christianity if the Roman Church were to divert its attention from proselyting notables to the greater task of correcting those abuses in the Roman system which outrage the conscience of an enlightened world. The Roman Pontiff might not have to bolster his prestige by creating an unprecedented number of cardinals and he certainly would have enhanced his moral and religious leadership if he had dared to stand against the monstrous evils of Nazism instead of waiting until the war was won to extol the glories of democracy. Furthermore his continued support of the Franco regime belies his espousal of democracy. His profession of concern for the downtrodden and oppressed would ring with less uncertainty if southern Italy, Spain and other areas where Rome has been undisputed for centuries were not festering with poverty, disease, dirt and illiteracy. His lip service to religious freedom has a hollow sound as long as Rome enjoys that freedom where she is in a minority only to deny it where she is dominant as in Spain and South America.

There is no law against the proselyting of Protestants if Rome chooses thus to exercise her missionary passion. If however Rome pursues this policy without correcting the abuses which cause so many of her children to leave the fold we can assure Msgr. Sheen and his associates in the art of converting Protestants that they have much work cut out for them in the years to come. The children of those who are forsaking Rome will provide an abundant supply of Protestant brands to be plucked from the burning.

FOR LENTEN DISCUSSION

EACH week during Lent we will present a number of questions based on articles featured in the series: Issues Before General Convention. Rectors or other discussion leaders we hope will find them helpful but we suggest that they add to them or make up their own questions. We add that authors are alone responsible for their contributions, the views expressed not necessarily being those of the editors.

Dr. Van Dusen's Article

1. Do you think that organic union of all Churches is desirable? Discuss your reasons.
2. Since organic union of all Churches is impossible as long as the Roman Church maintains its present position, do you think other Churches should settle their differences and unite?
3. What, practically, prevents the union of churches in your own community?
4. Is there "resentment and scorn toward the Episcopal Church" in your community on the part of members of other churches?
5. What are the recent historic steps in the proposal for the union of the Presbyterian and Episcopal Churches?
6. What has happened since the resolution, quoted by the author, was passed at the 1937 General Convention?
7. Do you think the author is correct in stating that opposition to the proposals is the fear of high churchmen that, "they would become an insignificant party on the extreme wing of a United Church"?
8. Do you agree that the Plan of Union "embraces everything which the great bulk of Episcopalians cherish as important"?
9. In view of the commitment made by the Episcopal Church in 1937 do you agree that the Convention this year must make an unequivocal and final decision?
10. If this decision is against union do you agree that "it will bring the gravest setback the cause of Christian unity has suffered in more than a century"?

Open Letter to Episcopalians

by Henry Pitney Van Dusen

President of Union Theological Seminary

I WRITE as a son of the Episcopal Church—an affectionate, albeit perhaps a somewhat wayward, son. Like many others, my childhood and youth were spent equally in the Episcopal and Presbyterian Churches; my father was an Episcopalian, my mother a Presbyterian. When the time came to assume the responsibilities of full membership in Christ's Church, we were attending St. Paul's Church, Chestnut Hill, and I was confirmed there. In the years since, I have treasured jealously the status of a layman (in good standing, I trust) in that great parish.

When I decided to prepare for the ministry, it was clear that temperament and conviction were more fully at home within Presbyterianism. But it was a narrow-edged decision. In sympathy and in affection, not a toe but a foot has remained firmly planted within the Episcopal Church. I rejoice in the liturgy of the Prayer Book, especially the service of Holy Communion. I have preached often in Episcopal cathedrals and parish churches. Many times I have shared in marriage and funeral services as guest of Episcopal rectors and bishops. I have many more intimate colleagues within the Episcopal ministry than in that of my own Church, and I am proud to claim at least a dozen of that magnificent group of younger bishops (incomparably the ablest and most gifted, though not the most influential, body of leaders in any American Communion) as close personal friends. Thus, I view the Episcopal Church as both an affectionate "insider" and a dispassionate "outsider."

As a son of that Church, I am frankly disturbed by a growing ground swell of bitterness, resentment and scorn toward the Episcopal Church. Episcopalians are, for the most part, unaware of it, partly because they are not habitually sensitive to what others think of their beloved Church, partly because friends in other Communions do not reveal their true feelings. This ground swell is found widely in many Communions. It is strongest among those of whatever denomination with whom devotion to Christian unity is not a matter merely of talk and prayer, but of action and life-commitment. What follows is less a record of personal conviction than a report of what is being very generally said throughout American Protestantism.

What are the facts? In the autumn of 1937, in the wake of the great World Christian Conferences at Oxford and Edinburgh, the Episcopal General Convention in Cincinnati declared unanimously, both Houses, its "purpose to achieve organic union" with the Presbyterian Church, U.S.A. Since so many Episcopalians appear to be unaware of the position to which their Church then committed itself, it may not be inappropriate to quote it in full:

> "The General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America, acting with full realization of the significance of its proposal, hereby invites the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America to join with it in accepting the following declaration:
> "The two Churches, one in the faith of the Lord Jesus Christ, the Incarnate Word of God, recognizing the Holy Scriptures as the supreme rule of faith, accepting the two Sacraments ordained by Christ, and believing that the visible unity of Christ's Church is the will of God, hereby formally declare their purpose to achieve organic union between their respective churches.
> "Upon the basis of these agreements the two Churches agree to take immediate steps toward the framing of plans whereby this end may be achieved."

This action took all Presbyterians by complete surprise. They had not proposed it; they would not have suggested it; the logic of kinship would have urged Episcopalians to seek, first, reunion with Methodists, children of their own household from whom they have been separated by only a century and a half, while Presbyterians turned to one or another of their cousins of the Reformed tradition. With characteristic caution stemming from their Scottish ancestry, the Presbyterian leaders made critical and thorough inquiry as to whether this was just another gesture by their sister-Communion which had acquired the reputation of "talking more and doing less" about Christian unity than any other major branch of Protestantism. They were assured by foremost spokesmen of all schools that the Episcopal Church really meant what it had said. Accordingly, the Presbyterian General Assembly adopted the resolution of the General Convention in identical language, and appointed representatives charged, not to discuss the matter or to explore possibilities, but to draw up a Plan on which the Churches might unite.

The history of the eight years since is a familiar story. The two commissions have presented a series of successive proposals—the Concordat, a plan for joint ordination, the "Basic Principles"—each proposal originating with the Episcopal representatives, each voted unanimously by the Presbyterian representatives and by a large majority of the Episcopal representatives. Each proposal has fallen into the discard under violent attack from a small minority within the Episcopal Communion. At the General Convention in Philadelphia next autumn, the Episcopal Commission should discharge its task by presenting a definite Plan of Union. There is more than a possibility that General Convention will again postpone decision or seek some convenient device to avoid the issue altogether. Is it any wonder that throughout American Protestantism, the Episcopal Church is increasingly likened to an adolescent school-girl who proposes marriage in leap-year, and then, when her offer is accepted, searches frantically for some escape from her pledged commitment?

DO NOT think that those who know the Episcopal Church intimately are not fully cognizant of and sympathetic with the problem which confronts that Church. They know well the parties within Episcopalianism, the very wide spread of conviction on matters of churchmanship, the extremely vague ties which hold such diversity within a common loyalty to Prayer Book and episcopacy.

In particular, sympathy is claimed for convinced "high churchmen." I trust I am not wide of the mark in interpreting their underlying dilemma somewhat as follows: If they are honest, they know that they at present constitute a minority within the Church. But they live in the hope (a hope, so many informed observers believe, with scant foundation) that the day will come when they can claim a majority of the Church for their views. If union with the Presbyterian Church is effected, that hope will evaporate. At present a small but convinced and militant minority who can prevent the Church as a whole from a course which they disapprove, they would become an insignificant party on the extreme wing of a United Church.

But there are two facts which should be faced and are not now being faced. In the first place, the Plan of Union, developed by the two commissions and proposed for action by the two Churches, leans much farther on points of difference between the two traditions to the Episcopal position than to the Presbyterian view. It includes nothing which an overwhelming majority of Episcopalians, both clergy and laity, regard as faulty. It omits nothing, absolutely nothing, which that same majority hold to be essential. In essence, it embraces everything which the great bulk of Episcopalians cherish as important, and adds to this, certain elements from the Presbyterian heritage which most Episcopalians who have been at pains to study the matter recognize as valuable.

In the second place, the Plan goes very much farther toward the fullest possible Episcopalian position than any delegate at Cincinnati in 1937 could have dared to anticipate when he voted the purpose of his Church to effect full organic union with the Presbyterian Church U.S.A. Those who voted "yes" then, and are trying to persuade their Church to say "no" now, can have taken their earlier action only either in ignorance or in insincerity. It is unthinkable that any responsible representative of the Church should have been so ignorant in these matters as to have failed to foresee clearly that any possible Basis of Union of the two Churches could not incorporate more of what he thinks important than the present Plan of Union does in fact incorporate. Is deliberate insincerity then suggested? Most certainly not. But there is a kind of covert insincerity of which Christians are often all too readily guilty, and which is really a form of ethical irresponsibility. And it must be questioned whether it is less blameworthy than overt hypocrisy.

WHAT, then, will happen at General Convention next autumn? And what should happen? What seems most likely to happen is that those who distrust union with the Presbyterians for reasons which to them are compelling will lead the great bulk of the Episcopal Church to search for some formula of delay or evasion which may be made to appear as less than retreat from the plighted promise of 1937 but which will, in fact, pigeon-hole union for an indefinite future.

What should happen? It is not suggested that the majority of the Convention should vote their Church into a Union which they have come to believe is unwise. In the relations between communities, as between individuals in courtship, it sometimes happens that one party pledges its promise to a step which it does not feel able to fulfill. In those circumstances, there is one honorable and manly course. It is frank and penitent withdrawal. What is urged is that, when General Convention meets, there should be no evasion of the issue, no "reinterpretation" of the facts, no cloak-room formulae which hide realities. Positively, what is urged is that the issue be squarely faced on the floor of Convention, that sides be frankly taken so that the decision, whichever way it ultimately goes, shall be unequivocal and final.

Let each man who votes understand clearly what is at stake. For what is at stake is not simply the destiny of two American Communions; in the larger view, that is a relatively unimportant matter. What is at stake is the welfare of Christ's Church. Be quite sure of this: if Episcopal-Presbyterian Union, having been solemnly pledged by both Communions and publicly professed for almost a decade, now falls to the ground, it will bring the gravest setback which the cause of Christian unity has suffered in more than a century—a setback for which no weight of pious protestations or prayers can make amends.

Lent, Sin and Psychiatry

by J. Clemens Kolb

Chaplain at the University of Pennsylvania

THE other day I went to a meeting to be addressed by a psychiatrist. The hall was packed. He talked for an hour and the people hung on every word. So did I. He talked about Moms and he described all the kinds of bad Moms there were in the world and went on to show how Mom after Mom practically destroyed the sons' and daughters' lives and usefulness. By the time he was through, there wasn't much left of Mom.

When the lecture was over, after the manner of such gatherings, we had tea. And while I stood there spoiling my appetite for dinner with sandwiches, cake, nuts, candy, sherbet, ice cream and coffee, I heard someone say, "When a psychiatrist gets hold of people, he can damn them to hell five times quicker than any clergyman I ever heard." "Oh," chuckled a doctor, "I call that faint praise for the clergy." The doctor spoke in jest, but he spoke profoundly. Today the people who are calling attention to human sin are the psychiatrists, whether they call it sin or not. They are the only ones who are damning people to hell, only they don't call it damnation and they don't call it hell; they call it frustration or something that sounds technical and scientific.

What clergy fail to observe is this: people want to be damned. People want to be damned because they want to be saved. It is true that if a clergyman simply stands in his pulpit and tells people they are sinners they will hardly lift an eyebrow; but that is because some of the grand, old, theological words have been worn threadbare through use and misuse until they no longer take hold. Let a psychiatrist recast the old words into new ones and tell people that they are introverts when they ought to be extroverts, or that they are frustrated, or that they have an oedipus complex or an inferiority complex and they will drink in his message as the peoples of old listened to the prophets speaking with the authority of the Almighty.

I said that people want to be damned, which reminds me of the saying of someone that when Christianity came into the world, it came bringing the good news of damnation. People want to be damned for the same reason that they want to be told that they are sick when they really are sick. When they are sick of body and some doctor comes along and simply gives them a little pat on the back and says, "Oh, you are all right; it is just your imagination," they turn right around and go to a doctor who delves a little more deeply into their aches and pains. People have no use for a doctor who finds nothing wrong with them. The doctor that they really respect is the doctor who diagnoses their trouble and then proceeds to treat them with the seriousness their illness demands. The operation that one brags about is the operation where he was snatched from the jaws of death; and the only salvation that is worth having is salvation where one feels with Wesley that he was snatched like a brand from the burning. When we are sick of body, we don't want sugar pills or mere comfort; we want hard facts and treatment. We want an honest diagnosis and an adequate treatment. And when we are sick of soul, we don't want to be told that we are saints. That sort of thing doesn't go down. We have contempt for a doctor who tells us we are well when we are sick, and we have contempt for a faith that does likewise.

One reason for the great popularity and usefulness of psychiatry is simply this: it has jumped into that field from which religion has drawn away, the field of sin and failure. Psychiatry goes down deep and comes up dirty. It doesn't pretend that we human critters come from heaven trailing clouds of glory. It has gotten away from the humanitarian position about as far as it is possible for a person to go. Because the psychiatrist deals honestly with the awful stuff that is inside of us, people have the sense to listen.

WHERE the Church has erred is in exactly the same place where the humanitarian has erred. He has glossed over human sin. Unlike the humanitarian, the Church hasn't given up salvation, but what it has really done is to hold out salvation to mankind and then practically in the same breath tell them that they don't need it. If I were dying of cancer and the doctor told me there was nothing wrong with me but that I could occasionally take a little tonic, I might or might not take the tonic; but if I were dying and the doctor told me I was dying and said, "This penicillen will save your life and it is the only thing that will," I would be pretty careful to take that penicillen every time he ordered it. So we tell people to worship, but we do not tell them why except that they ought to. We tell them to give to missions, but we don't tell them why except that it is their duty as Christians. We provide the sacraments and tell them they ought to receive them, but we fail to tell them how really important they are. And we try to teach our people to pray; but we only tell them it is a good thing to pray, not that it is an all-vital thing.

Thank goodness the Church still has Lent. It still has a time when, in theory at least, it still deals with sin and, in theory at least, it convinces people of their soul sickness. It is the time when we have a chance to bring our people to realize that they are under the judgment of God. If we spend our time merely preaching comfortable sermons, we can only blame ourselves if our churches are empty, because we are not giving them anything worth going for. As an amusement center, we cannot compete with the movies; as a producer of great music, the Church cannot compete with the symphony, hardly with the town chorus; for sheer eloquence the clergy are not particularly impressive, even when they attempt the great themes that are at their disposal. It is only as we can minister to people's deepest needs, their sins and their desire for salvation, or their imperfections and their longing for perfection, for their earthliness and their desire for godliness, that we can expect to be of large usefulness.

It may be true that in the Middle Ages before the time of St. Francis the Church lay under the shadow of judgment and had too little of the joy of religion, until St. Francis came—too much of Lent and not enough of Easter; but now the shoe is on the other foot—too much of Easter and not enough of Lent. After all, the center of our religion is a cross where God died for our sins. Whoever puts anything else in the center of our faith, let him, in the words of the ancient canons, "Be anathema."

Talking It Over

By
W. B. SPOFFORD

WITH millions of lines printed in the American press about the elevation of the new cardinals it is perhaps significant that the oath they were required to take was either played down or ignored. Placing their hands on a Bible each man swore to uphold, increase and promote in every way, including temporal, rights pertaining to the sovereignty of the Church and the Pope. They swore to defend ecclesiastical properties and not dispose of them without the Pope's permission and faithfully to observe the rulings of each and all decrees promulgated by the Congregation of Ceremonies. They swore to "keep, protect, or recuperate its (Holy See's) rights against any other authority"; to defend the liberty, honors, privileges and authority of the Holy See and to inform the Pope immediately, or his successors, of any plots which the cardinals themselves are unable to forestall.

Just how such a pledge can be made to jibe with the obligations of American citizenship, Cardinal Spellman and his fellow citizens have no doubt neatly figured out. But in these days when the word "subversive" is so glibly used, and when a committee of Congress accuses citizens who supported the Spanish Loyalists with being "prematurely anti-fascists," one wonders just what sort of an Alice in Wonderland world we are living in.

New Secretary Gives Program For the Church League

Proposes That National Office Be Moved To Industrial Centers from Time to Time

By Sara Dill

Washington:—The acceptance of the Rev. William B. Spofford Jr. of the position of executive secretary of the Church League for Industrial Democracy, effective June 1, was announced at the annual meeting of the organization, held at the Church of the Epiphany on February 22nd. The new secretary, twenty-five years of age, is a graduate of Antioch College and the Episcopal Theological School, and at present is minister-in-charge of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Boston, and assistant secretary of the social service department of the diocese of Massachusetts.

Speakers at the luncheon held in connection with the business meeting were the Rev. Joseph F. Fletcher of the faculty of the Episcopal Theological School and Mr. Joseph Evans, regional director of the Fair Employment Practices Committee. Dr. Fletcher, one of a number of clergymen recently to join pickets at the East Boston plant of General Electric Co., explained why he felt it necessary for a clergyman who had made up his mind on the merits of an industrial dispute to implement his convictions with action. Mr. Evans presented the history of the FEPC and then offered a number of cases handled by the committee to illustrate the importance of its work. Presiding at the luncheon was the Rev. Charles Sheerin, the rector of the Epiphany.

Mr. Spofford in accepting the leadership of the CLID said that the "magnitude and importance of the task" filled him with a mixed feeling of humility, inadequacy, fear and excitement. "It does not take a great deal of prophetic insight to read the signs of our times correctly. Modern man is caught up in the maelstrom of social change and that powerful and extremely vocal group of reactionaries is seeking to insure that the change shall be in a backward direction. Opposed to them is a less powerful and less vocal group of radicals who are fighting to make sure that the change continues to add to man's freedom and man's true fellowship with God."

He went on to describe how man has passed through three major revolutions since the 16th century: the revolution to free man's mind in the Renaissance and Reformation; the revolution to liberate man politically centered first in America and France; the contemporary revolt which is aimed at liberating man economically—to give him justice and the reality of the full life. "From every indication it is apparent that the United States is the country which gives greatest promise of remaining isolated from this fundamental movement of growth. It is apparent that this is the great struggle of our generation. It is a struggle which we as Church members and as members of the CLID are completely and dynamically involved."

The new secretary then outlined the task that in his judgment faces the organization. First an expanded and more formal organization is called for. "It has been said," he declared, "that the CLID is more a state of mind than an organization. To a certain extent that is true; it is a collection of like-minded Church people. But if it is to function effectively we must have organization — organization made up of committed, dependable people; people who can be depended upon to act in any given situation. Most of the present struggle is being fought out in the committees of legislatures. If we are to be effective it is necessary to have members throughout the country who, given the word, can bring the witness of Christian pressure to bear on these committees."

He spoke of the need for new members and particularly "keeping up with the younger members of the Church, many of whom are being lost to the Church because they think the Church never takes any vital, unequivocal stand and action upon the major social problems of our time."

Likewise he stressed the need of adding laymen to the membership of the organization. "There are many union men active in our churches, serving as vestrymen and as officers of men's clubs. They are personally concerned in the present conflicts: they have the most to gain and the most to lose. They should be brought into the CLID where they could see that their Christian affirmation has a direct bearing, and a definite responsibility, in the struggle."

After stressing that local chapters needed to be strengthened and literature and bulletins sent to members regularly, he interpreted the job of executive secretary as being that of a trouble-shooter. He then suggested that the central office of the League might well be moved from time to time to some "potential critical area" — New York, Detroit, Cincinnati, St. Louis, the South, the West Coast. "In this way the League would be better able to keep abreast of the times and bring the Church's witness to the areas of conflict, and at the same time build up membership which can act as a real leaven in the social field in those areas."

Most of the time at the business meeting was devoted to revising the program of the League which is done annually. This program sets forth the aims of the League at home, in the international area and in the Church.

There was also a report by the assistant treasurer, the Rev. William Sharp, which reaveled that approximately $7,500 has been raised or pledged on the new annual budget of $10,400. He expressed the hope that members and friends would contribute the balance before the new secretary takes office since the budget is the minimum needed to carry on effective work.

There was also considerable discussion about possible activities at General Convention this fall, with a committee appointed to work out plans. A nominating committee also was appointed which was charged with the task of nominating officers and members of the national committee, to be elected by postal ballot later this year.

The final hour of the meeting was devoted to a discussion of the possibility of forming a Washington chapter of the League, with Mr. Arthur Fawcett, who was the chairman of the national meeting, turning the chair over to the Rev. Brooke Mosley, social service secretary of the diocese of Washington. It was agreed that there should be a chapter and a committee was appointed on ways and means with the first meeting of the new chapter being held this week.

Grace, New York

New York: — Grace Church is celebrating the 100th anniversary of the consecration of the present edifice this month with a series of services and meetings. It opened last Sunday morning at a service when Bishop Manning preached and an evening service at which the preacher was the Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity, Boston, who was once on the staff of Grace Church. The anniversary dinner was on March 5 when the address was by Secretary of war, Robert P. Patterson, with Judge Augustus Noble Hand, warden, the toastmaster. There were also brief addresses by Bishop Gilbert of New York; the Rev. Felix Kloman of Philadelphia, also once on the staff; Rector Elmore McKee of St. George's; the Rev. J. V. Moldenhawer, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church and the Rev. Louis W. Pitt, rector of Grace Church.

Other preachers during the month will be Nicholai, bishop of Ochrida, Yugoslavia; the Rev. W. Russell Bowie of Union Seminary, former rector; Bishop Littell, retired bishop of Honolulu; the Rev. Frederic S. Fleming, rector of Trinity Church; the Rev. John A. Bell, rector of the Incarnation.

Discuss Rural Work

Minneapolis: — Bishops of the midwest held a two day conference here at St. Mark's to discuss rural Church work. Leading the meeting was the Rev. Clifford L. Samuelson, national rural work secretary, who said that the leaders of the Church were "increasingly coming to recognize that the future Christian vitality of the nation depends on a stronger Christian work in rural areas." He also stated that "rural clergy have suffered discouragement and frustration, not being adequately supported either in salary or morale. Many competent clergy have actually been starved out of their rural church ministry."

A good deal of time was spent in discussing possible realignment of mission churches so as to provide a more effective oversight.

Bishops attending were Atwill of North Dakota; Brinker of Nebraska; Roberts and Gesner of South Dakota; Haines of Iowa; Ingley of Colorado; Daniels of Montana; Ziegler of Wyoming; Keeler and Kemerer of Minnesota.

New President

Berkeley, Calif.: — Ronald Bridges was inaugurated president of the Pacific School of Religion on February 18. He is the moderator of the Congregational-Christian Churches and is probably the first layman to be the president of a theological school. Taking part in the service was Bishop Walters of San Joaquin and the faculty of the Church Divinity School of the Pacific.

Housing of Vets

Washington (RNS):—A group of religious leaders conferred in the White House with President Harry S. Truman and laid plans for a nationwide "share your home with a veteran" drive which will begin the middle of March. The churchmen told reporters after the conference that the drive would be national in scope, and would be opened with a statement by President Truman to central organizations of all denominations and faiths, but that it will be essentially "local in character." The program for the campaign will include sermons from every possible pulpit, conferences between pastors, or their designated representatives, and veterans who are members of congregations, and a survey to determine the lack of housing facilities. Earl Frederick Adams, executive director of the Protestant Council of New York City, pointed out that if all of the 250,000 churches and synagogues in the nation were to provide temporary housing for five veterans each, at least 1,250,000 veterans would be able to live more comfortably.

College Workers

Sewanee, Tenn.: — College workers of the province of Sewanee held a three day conference here at the University of the South, Feb. 19-21, to consider problems of college Church work in the South. Program headliners were Bishop Dandridge of Tennessee; Alexander Guerry, vice-chancellor of the university; the Rev. Thomas Barrett, national secretary of college work.

Associate Members

New York: — Mrs. Henry Hill Pierce, national chairman of the Episcopal Pacifist Fellowship, reports a gratifying response to a letter recently sent to the clergy inviting them to become associate members of the organization. Regular members pledge themselves "to refuse to participate in or give moral support to any war" but the new classification enables others to as-

Syracuse, N. Y.:—Bishop John C. Ward, retired bishop of Erie, is assisting Bishop Malcolm Peabody in the diocese of Central New York, filling a number of appointments for confirmations and parish visitations.

Carload a Week

Boston: — The department of social service of Massachusetts has set a carload of clothing a week as the objective of its drive for clothing for the destitute peoples of Europe. The receiving center is the Church of the Good Shepherd where the Rev. W. B. Spofford Jr. is minister in charge.

New Organist

Boston: — Frederick H. Johnson, for eighteen years the organist and choirmaster at the Advent here has accepted a similar position at the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, effective May 1.

Japanese-Americans

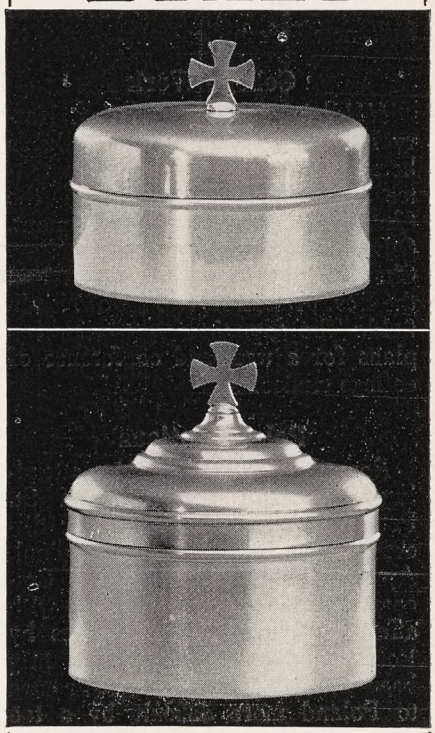
Cincinnati:—The youth offering this year will provide scholarships for the training of Japanese-American young people for Christian work in Japan. The decision was made at the annual meeting of the youth commission which met here February 15-19, and was attended by twenty-five young people representing the eight provinces of the Church. The program for the youth division, which goes into effect in September, is to be available in time for summer conference courses. Tentative plans were also made for a national youth convention to be held September 14-15 in Philadelphia as a part of General Convention.

The commission met at Orleton Farms where they were the guests of Miss Mary Johnston. National Council member, who is also a member of the youth commission.

Exchange Pulpits

Akron, Ohio:—In the interest of promoting better race relations and in keeping with the spirit of brotherhood week, the Rev. Murray Kenney, rector of St. Andrew's, here, exchanged pulpits on February 17 with the Rev. Charles Taylor, rector of All Saints, Toledo. Both clergymen were guests in the homes of the senior wardens, Mr. J. Kimbrough of Toledo and Mr. J. B. Binns of Akron. St. Andrew's has taken a progressive position on race relations. During the past year a Japanese priest, a Negro priest and a Jewish rabbi have participated in services.

An Anniversary



Burlington, Vt.:—The tenth anniversary of the consecration of Bishop Vedder VanDyck of Vermont was observed on February 25th with a service at St. Paul's, followed by a luncheon.

Unite for Action

Boston:—Social relations groups of five Churches sponsored a two-day seminar on legislative action here on February 25-26. The opening session was presided over by Bishop Raymond A. Heron, suffragan bishop of Massachusetts, with representatives of the Baptist, Congregational, Methodist, Universalist and Episcopal Churches present. Various authorities spoke on legislation pending on public health, full employment, civil liberties, lotteries. There was also a session devoted to bills now before Congress.

College Work

Middlebury, Vt.:—The Rev. Harry H. Jones, rector of St. Stephen's here, is the chairman of a committee to survey the work of the Church in colleges of Vermont. Others on the committee are the Rev. Charles Martin of Burlington and the Rev. Francis R. Nitchir of Northfield. The committee is considering plans for a week-end conference of college students.

Poles Cautious

Rome:—Polish Catholics attending the public consistory in St. Peter's Basilica were markedly discreet in hailing their new cardinal, Archbishop Adam Sapieha of Cracow. The cardinal was greeted with affectionate but subdued salutes by Polish soldiers who had evidently been warned not to make his return to Poland more difficult by a too open display of fidelity. This Polish army in Italy has been a problem of the UNO, with the Soviet government contending that it is a fascist army with the ultimate aim of overthrowing the present Polish government.

St. David's Day

Wilkes-Barre, Pa.:—The annual St. David's day service was held here at St. Stephen's, on February 24, when the Orpheus glee club, the choir of Emmanuel Baptist Church and the choir of St. Stephen's joined forces for Gymanfa Ganu, which is Welsh for Singing Festival. The program printed the words of the hymns in both English and Welsh.

Although little is known of St. David, the patron saint of Wales, it is quite certain he was born in Cardiganshire, Wales, in the seventh century. He became Bishop of Menevia, a seaport later known as St. Davids. Many stories are told of St. David. One of the most familiar is the basis for the traditional picture of him standing on a hill with a dove perched on his shoulder. The people were called together for instruction in the true doctrine of the Church. So great a crowd assembled that it was not humanly possible for a preacher to make himself heard. One after another tried and failed. Finally they called on David, who spoke with the voice of a trumpet. While he was speaking a dove sat on his shoulder and the ground slowly raised him upward until he was standing on top of a hill and all the people heard every word he spoke. St. David's Day is March 1st, on which day the Welsh people wear leeks, his special emblem, much as the Irish wear shamrocks on St. Patrick's Day. It is said that the Welsh wore leeks at David's suggestion in a battle against the Saxons to distinguish them from their enemies.

SILENT EVANGELISM

In 1945, its second year, over 400,000 Silent Evangelists were sent to non-Episcopalians by Laymen of the Episcopal Church.

SILENT EVANGELISM enlists the aid of Laymen in the work of creating Public Interest in the Episcopal Church.

With the combined efforts and cooperation of the Clergy SILENT EVANGELISM can develop into a program that would equal an expenditure of millions of dollars worth of free publicity for the Episcopal Church and the Christian Religion without costing the Church any money.

In breadth of influence SILENT EVANGELISM could become to the Episcopal Church what the modern Radio hour is to other Churches.

called Camac House. It will be used to minister to the needs of the children and young people of the locality. The program started a few months ago when the Presbytery of Philadelphia bought a dilapidated structure on North Camac Street and arranged with the Westminster Fellowship Council to have the property improved. To renovate the building, the Council set up a series of one-day work projects. Each Saturday six Negro and six white young people from the eight churches worked on its repair. Wearing slacks and old shirts, they painted the walls, woodwork and furniture, scraped and sandpapered the floors, scrubbed and washed the plumbing, and removed ashes and debris. Their industriousness paid off. The work was completed in four weeks instead of the originally scheduled eight.

The future program of Camac House will be under the direction of the Rev. and Mrs. Shelton Waters, who will live in a small apartment on the third floor of the house. Young people throughout the Presbytery will have an opportunity to continue their help by assisting at Sunday school classes, manual art classes, discussion groups, and in the recreational program.

Raise Millions

Atlantic City, N. J. (RNS):—Plans for a survey to locate in the war-devastated countries of Europe and Asia workers and members of the Methodist Church permanently injured in war, and to determine the number of the denomination's churches, missions, and schools damaged, were completed here by the committee on policy and program, division of foreign missions of the Methodist Church. The survey and at least a start of the work of rehabilitation will be financed by a $14,667,500 allotment from a $25,000,000 war relief and reconstruction fund already raised among the 8,000,000 Methodists in the United States, according to Ralph E. Diffendorfer, New York, the committee's executive secretary.

"The survey will be launched among a foreign constituency of hundreds of thousands of Methodists. Human needs will take precedent over property reconstruction, except where churches or missions can be restored by repair," Diffendorfer explained.

Two of the places where church property will be rebuilt, he said, will be Hiroshima and Nagasaki, the Japanese cities on which atomic bombs were dropped.

A million-dollar appropriation has been set aside to finance scholarships in U. S. schools and colleges for foreign students, with preference to be given those in such war-torn countries as China, Korea, Japan and Germany, and with students from India and Latin America also invited.

Joins World Council

Geneva (wireless to RNS): — The Evangelical Church of Austria has joined the World Council of Churches, it was announced at Council headquarters here. Formerly a member of the German Evangelical Church Federation, the Austrian body became a part of the German Evangelical Church in 1939, but broke off organizational ties last year.

A report prepared by Bishop Gerhard May of Vienna last summer stated that the Evangelical Church of Austria then numbered 170 pastors and 320,000 members.

German Missions

here. Prominent among those present was Siegfried Knack, vice-chairman of the German Evangelical Missionary Society. The Council pledged it will "seek an early outlet for German missionary devotion and opportunities for service by individuals, preferably maintained by their own boards, but sponsored by, and serving with, non-German societies." It was pointed out that after the last war, German missionaries were either not permitted to return to their fields or not allowed to do so for many years.

In connection with its trusteeship of orphaned missions, the Council gave assurances that German societies will be consulted before any definite action is taken, and that reparations will be made for return of German missions now held as enemy property by Allied custodians. The Council explained it will urge that such properties be conserved for mission work under German or other auspices in forthcoming international settlements, and that alternative opportunities for German missionary service will be given full attention.

MRS. HENRY HILL PIERCE
Churchwoman of New York City

How can the men be answered who asked "Why is it wrong?" as Chaplain Tittman reports in his article Church and Sex Relations (WITNESS, Feb. 7). Can the men be told that breaking the 7th commandment is wrong while they are being trained to break the 6th and the more efficiently they do it the better.

VIDA D. SCUDDER
Prof.-Emeritus at Wellesley College

Is a brief report anent clergy-picketing in order? The other day, a certain friend of mine, a Baptist minister, told me with mingled joy and humility about some Episcopal clergy on the picket line in Massachusetts. He was joyful, because he also had been there; humble because seven Episcopalians had I think been on the line, and only two ministers of other Communions. My own reaction was amused pleasure, for we Anglicans don't any too often find our clergy taking a bold positive stand on practical social issues, as compared with representatives of other Churches, Roman Catholic or Protestant. Every Christian must decide for himself the vexed and vexing question of legitimate partizanship, not to mention activity, in secular matters. But . . . well, I can only repeat that I was pleased. Perhaps I ought to sign myself, Penitently yours.

MRS. JOHN F. HAMBLIN
Churchwoman of Newark, N. J.

Under heading Church Protests (WITNESS, Feb. 21) it states the social service commissions of New York and Massachusetts have sent petitions of protest to President Truman on the return of American dead from the war fronts. Are these commissions qualified to speak for their entire dioceses in that they are speaking for members of their own families? Are any of these clergymen young enough to have ministered at the front when the call for army and navy chaplains was so badly needed?

Many boys of our faith went out without the benefit of the ministrations of their Church, and no petitions were signed to bring weight to bear on the President to see that young men of our ministry were drafted or urged to enlist in a purely spiritual ministry.

Let social service boards before calling families "pagan" who have given so much ask themselves, "Did I give as much for my country?"

CAPT. LIONEL R. LAWRENCE
U. S. Navy, Harper, Washington

I have been reading THE WITNESS for many months and I read it from cover to cover and enjoy all of it. Then I give it to friends who are not by any means Episcopalians and they enjoy it to. I was raised in the Episcopal Church as a boy and received a training which has not been forgotten. However due to the nature of my work and the community in which I live I attend service at a small Evangelical Church, where the children bring their parents. Here you hear the most important question asked and answered: What will you do with Jesus, which is called Christ?

Jesus loved the men that made their living on an inland sea (Galilee); I too make my living on an inland sea (Puget Sound). After reading the opinions and discussions of many learned minds may a humble sailorman venture a thought: "Except the Lord build the house they labor in vain that built it" also "who to know aright is life eternal."

I read with joy of the evangelistic program in the Episcopal Church. That is needed. Also you are for religious tolerance and are against color discrimination. Truly our Saviour could endorse that. However salvation is a personal thing and each individual and nation will someday learn that. My family and I believe the whole Bible from cover to cover and what we cannot understand we accept in simple childlike faith as God's holy word. This may not be logic, but I believe it is "beating our swords into plowshares and our spears into pruning hooks." "Love worketh no ill to its neighbor, therefore love is the fulfilling of the law."

ROBB WHITE, JR.
Woodberry Forest, Virginia

In Talking It Over (Feb. 21), the pronouncement by our Episcopal bishops states: "Every member of the human race has a right to steady employment, and income, and leisure," etc. This causes the suspicion that even an Episcopal bishop may be so busy looking at the forest that he overlooks some of the fundamentals of a tree. The tree must first take the trouble to send a network of roots down into a soil that can support its growth. It doesn't just be, and then demand.

Back in the old days, the Lord made the earth, and told the man it was his for meat. Till it, and subdue it, and replenish it. Presumably the man built himself a shack, and set to work tilling a patch of it. Quite possibly some of the sons of Lilith, or of the giants that were in those days, came along, took a fancy to the idea, and demanded of the man the right to work in his garden, on their own terms. Quite possibly the man pointed out to them that patch was his, but that there was plenty more ground untilled in that garden east of Eden. For all we know, they may have organized a union, and thrown poor man out on his head.

A little later, some chaps who found "serving the earth" not to their liking, started working in brass and other metals (perhaps iron and steel). They may have met the same fate, at the hands of the Metal Workers' Union.

In the days of horses without buggies, some other Episcopalians, not bishops, lauded happiness. But they were more modest. They proclaimed a "right to pursue it." The right to pursue a job is all the Episcopal Church gives its clergy. You, Mr. editor, may be out of a job some day, and may desire Trinity or St. Bartholomew's. You will be free to pull all the wires, write all the letters, etc. to sell yourself. Would you like us clergy to picket Trinity until they agreed to your terms?

Carleton College Has a Fine Program for Servicemen

Veterans Doing Successful Academic Work And Prove Leaders in Campus Activities

By Frank R. Kille
Dean of Men at Carleton College

Northfield, Minn.:—Early in the present academic year, Carleton College announced that veterans would be admitted at mid-semester and at mid-year. In view of the educational needs of returning men and women of the armed forces, we could not justify our regular plan of admission. The admission of veterans three times in a period of nineteen weeks has required ingenuity and a maximum flexibility. The enthusiastic support of the faculty and staff has not only made the adjustment possible but has maintained a quality of work comparable to our best peacetime efforts.

The detailed plans for each registration vary, but are constant in principle. The veteran enters at once into our regular liberal arts program which has as its goal a sound general education. No refresher courses have been set up and none are contemplated. Veterans enter with a full program of work. Wherever adjustment has been difficult, faculty members have given freely of their time outside of class. Social and academic adjustments have justified our belief that the greater maturity and seriousness of the veteran would more than offset the break in the sequence of his education. All are doing as well as when they entered service, and the majority are doing much better. Many are carrying more than the normal load and doing quality work. Instructors and students alike have been impressed with the way these men have made the adjustment from military life to a regular college program.

Not only has the veteran been doing successful academic work, but he is the leader in campus activities. Newly elected class officers, heads of men's organizations, and members of our athletic teams are predominantly veterans. They sing in the glee club and the choir, take part in dramatics, and, generally, lose their identity as veterans by merging with the student body in every interest and activity.

Part of the reason for the homogeneity of our student body, in spite of the various experiences of a war, is that the college has gone out of its way to see that the veteran knows what kind of a school he is selecting. We continue to assert on every occasion that we are a small, coeducational, church-related college, and that we expect every member of our community to behave as a responsible citizen and a member of a Christian community. For example, the veteran understands when he enters Carleton College that he will be expected to attend two weekly chapel services and the Sunday evening vesper service. He soon recognizes that these religious exercises are thought to be an important part of the life of the college which he has selected. We have rarely received a request from a veteran that he be excused, and we have been encouraged by Carletonians who have returned from service to make no exceptions. In short, we will maintain the standards which are expected to exist in a church-related school. We believe confidently that there are many veterans who will wish to continue their education in this atmosphere.

No veteran has been refused admission whose records and interests indicate that he can successfully carry the work at Carleton College. Those in charge of boarding and housing arrangements for the enlarged student body have been as resourceful as the faculty. The residents of the town of Northfield have helped greatly by offering the use of spare rooms. However, most veterans have been placed in college houses near the campus or in the attractive new dormitory created by an extensive remodeling of the stadium. This was accomplished without limiting the athletic facilities. The dormitory will probably be retained as a permanent part of our dormitory system. The men eat in the regular college dining hall and are served by their classmates who need financial assistance.

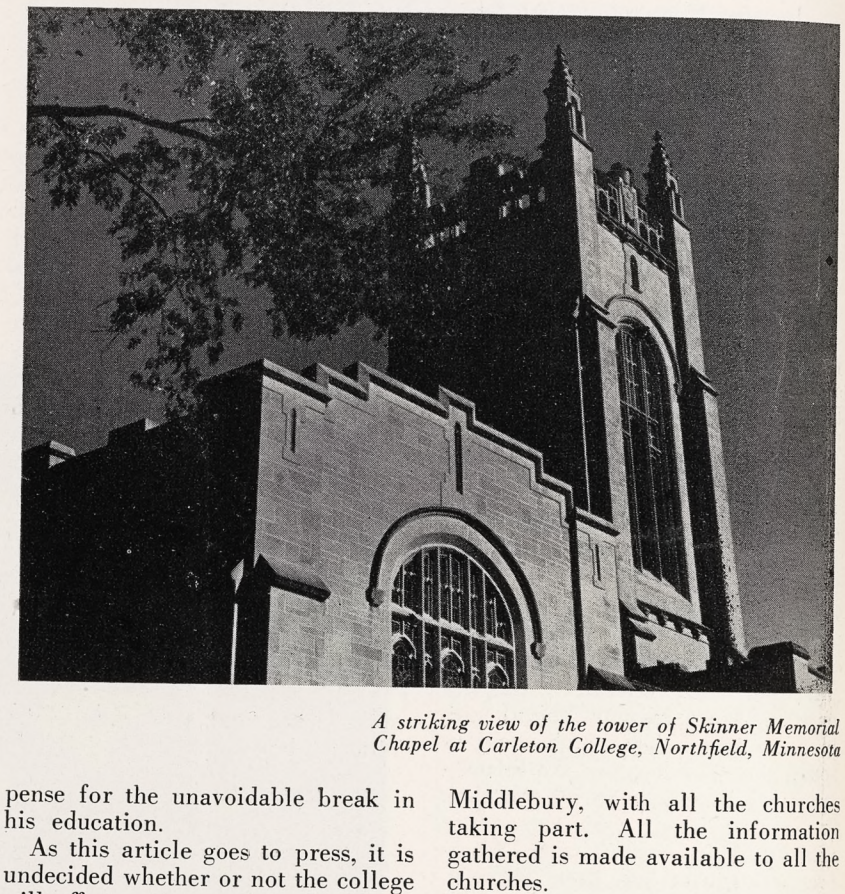
The special interests and problems of the veterans are cared for in various ways. A Veterans' Affairs Committee, composed of faculty members and the Associate Dean of Men, who are themselves veterans of this war, meets every week at a stated period to hold an open forum. Any individual, or the representative of any group, may attend. In addition, the Dean of Men meets weekly with an appointed Men's Council to consider college matters involving both veterans and non-veterans. It is, therefore, unnecessary to secure formal office appointments to bring any matter before the faculty and administration. These regularly scheduled committee meetings have been effective in preventing misunderstandings and in planning a program to meet the needs of the veterans.

In addition, the office of the Dean of Men, and the office of Admissions, have as assistants one or two graduates of the college who have been discharged recently. These young men, who have just returned from active service, understand both the college program and military experiences. The assistants room and eat with the men and are constantly at their service in innumerable ways.

The college grants credits for courses of college calibre taken while in military service. The recommendation of the American Council on Education is followed for the most part. In addition, veterans may obtain credit by examination if other military training or experiences have contributed to their intellectual development. At time of registration, no blanket college credit is given for military service as such. During the senior year, however, a small amount may be allowed to offset any unusual hardship that might otherwise result. In such cases, the chairman of the major department and the Dean of Men may grant up to eight semester hours for military service. This will be done only when it is clear that such a grant does not impair the program of work which the student is pursuing. This grant is limited, for we have the conviction that military service is not ordinarily a substitute for college work. In some ways, military service may be more valuable, but it cannot take the place of any large part of the instruction and the student's effort which results in a general education. The college will grant the veteran every opportunity and assist in all possible ways to make available to him the ingredients of a general education on which he can look back, in later years, with real satisfaction. We want him to be equipped as well as those men who obtained their education under normal conditions. If, in addition, his experience in military service gives him certain advantages, this will be some recompense for the unavoidable break in his education.



As this article goes to press, it is undecided whether or not the college will offer a summer term. If it does not, full credit will be given for work done elsewhere in approved summer school sessions.

LENTEN PREACHERS IN WILKES-BARRE

Wilkes-Barre, Pa.: — Lenten preachers at St. Stephen's here are Methodist Bishop Fred P. Corson of Philadelphia; the Rev. Phillips Elliott, Presbyterian of Brooklyn; Dean Chester B. Emerson of Cleveland; the Rev. Daniel A. Poling, Baptist of Philadelphia; the Rev. Harold Bosley, Methodist of Baltimore; Bishop Sterrett of Bethlehem; the Rev. DONATION SENT FOR EUROPE

New York:—The Presiding Bishop, after consultation with the National Council committee on aid to sister Churches, announced the first major allocations for relief of suffering peoples in Europe and Asia and for reconstruction of Church life and work in devastated areas. Based on actual moneys in hand and upon estimates of anticipated contributions, checks for the first quarter of 1946 amounting to $152,625 are being transmitted to the World Council of Churches, the Committee for Relief in Asia, and associated agencies in the ecumenical movement.

Federal Council Meets in Mood Of Gloom and Pessimism

Dulles Says United States Is in Danger Of Being Isolated in New World Situation

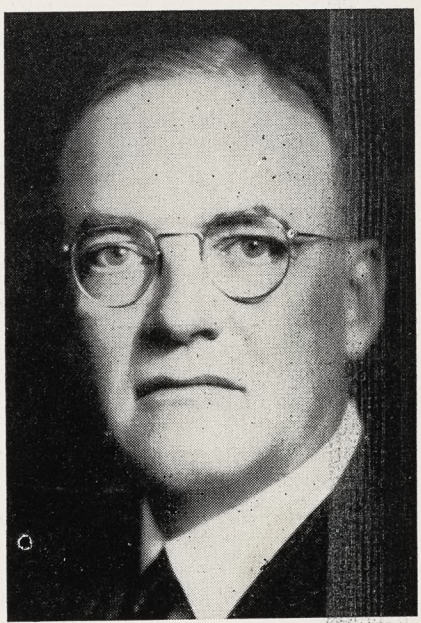
By W. B. Spofford

Columbus, Ohio:—A spirit of pessimism mingled with hope characterized the special meeting of the Federal Council of Churches here March 5-7, when leaders of the affiliated Churches gathered to discuss the Church's responsibility to national and international problems. There were more than five hundred delegates present, representing twenty-five denominations of the United States and Canada. Various speakers expressed the conviction that the state of the world is so bad that it is likely to fall apart unless the Churches, united in fellowship, pull it together.

John Foster Dulles, delegate to the assembly of the UNO in London, and chairman of the Council's commission on a just and durable peace, talked of "forbidding scenes everywhere in the world," of "rife pessimism," of "bitter disillusionment" and more especially of the "political disunity between the great Allies which won the war."

"There is disunity so great that it makes a mockery of those freedoms from fear and want which were the avowed goals of the war. The British for example, feel that their national safety is almost as much imperiled today by Soviet activities in the Mediterranean and the Near East as it was imperiled when Rommel was knocking at the door of Egypt. Such fears congeal the hearts of men and they prevent lifting from the world the terrible burden of vast armament."

Regarding the 750 million colonial peoples "now in a state of unrest," Mr. Dulles said: "The United Nations charter took account of their needs and went far to pledge the colonial powers to policies which would peacefully provide self-government, free institutions and, when appropriate, independence. The first Assembly did much to vitalize those provisions. But violence is rife and the Soviet Union is giving moral, if not material, encouragement to that violence. Perhaps it does so out of sincere belief in principles of freedom and human liberty. Perhaps it does so because violent colonial revolutions would weaken the Western democracies of Europe, Britain, France, Belgium and Holland—which have tended to coalesce into a political bloc."



Mr. Dulles said the United States is now in more danger of becoming "isolated" than of becoming "isolationist," because to the rest of the world we appear to be living in what seems "fabulous, almost immoral prosperity."

"We seem to indulge in the luxury of suspending production, which the world desperately needs, because labor and capital cannot agree on how to divide the profits to come out of catering to that need," he said. "And for that reason our nation is in grave danger of being isolated spiritually, economically and politically."

The best way of averting future wars, Mr. Dulles believes, is by the frank discussion of the "realistic facts resulting from this war." "Wars to end wars are an illusion," he said. "Wars more than any form of human activity create the conditions which breed more war."

"But this fact must not be used to generate discouragement, defeatism, or a fatalistic acceptance of new war as inevitable," he added. "Only newborn spiritual intensity can orient the world in a new direction. I see a great deal of hope for the world if the American people are frankly told that this war put in jeopardy most of the gains which, under the influence of Christianity, had been slowly consolidated over nineteen centuries and that only supreme effort will save for us or for any one any appreciable part of what we call western or Christian civilization."

The report on atomic warfare, prepared by twenty-one Church leaders, most of whom are professors in seminaries and colleges, asked that the U. S. publicly declare that it will under no circumstances be the first to use atomic weapons in future wars; said that the bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki was "morally indefensible" and also condemned the obliteration bombing of German centers. The signers of the document, which included Bishop Angus Dun and the Rev. Theodore O. Wedel, both of Washington, as the representatives of the Episcopal Church, also urged "that all manufacture of atom bombs be stopped, pending development of international controls" and also that "ultimately" the control of atomic energy must be "assigned to civilians not military agencies." Monopolistic exploitation by cartels "or other minority groups" must be prevented, the statement declared, with the "supervising agencies assuring a wide and equitable distribution of whatever economic benefits may result from the use of atomic energy."

John Foster Dulles presents a gloomy report as chairman of the Federal Council's commission on a just and durable peace

The statement did not make one want to stand up and cheer for the UNO but at least it did not condemn the world organization (see "Quotes" on page seven) but rather indicated that it might eventually develop into a set-up that could be trusted to handle the bomb. No mention was made in the statement of the Soviet Union, but one member of the group that prepared the document perhaps revealed the mind of the whole when he said privately, "We better hang on to the secret for awhile until we learn whether Russia is going to behave. It is about the only bargaining weapon we have."

Thus the leaders of Protestantism are penitent for the sins of the United States to the point of suggesting the rebuilding of two Japanese cities "as a token of repentence" and of providing "relief and rebuilding" to Germany rather than insisting on such an un-Christian thing as "economic dismemberment." But when it comes to a former ally, the Soviet Union, fear overpowers repentance and we advocate, with Winston Churchill, the guarding of the atomic energy secret "until we learn whether Rusia is going to behave." And so, my friends, there apparently is a class struggle after all, as Hitler and his friends insisted all along.

Methodist Bishop Oxnam, as president of the Council, declared it to be the "duty of the Church to make clear the ethical criteria by which economic practices shall be judged" and said that "a man's opportunity to earn his living ought to be based upon his character and his capacity and never be determined by his color." He also said that Protestants "are resolved to maintain and extend religious liberty until at last every man shall possess the precious privilege of worshiping God according to the dictates of his own conscience."

Outstanding speakers at the meeting were the Rev. Henry Sloane Coffin of New York who spoke on community tensions; the Rev. E. G. Homrighausen of Princeton on evangelism; the Rev. Roy A. Burkhart of Columbus on the returned servicemen; and the Rev. Ralph E. Diffendorfer who presented the obligation of the Church to meet the world's gigantic relief problems over a period of years.

A highlight of the meeting was an address on March 6th when President Truman told the delegates and friends, numbering about 800, that threats of new conflicts, both at home and abroad, would be solved if there was "a moral and spiritual awakening in the life of individuals and in the councils of the nations." He also declared that "atomic energy must be matched by a spiritual strength of greater magnitude." He spoke feelingly about the many problems facing the nation; delinquency, the need for housing; support of the fair employment practices act; health legislation; the extension of social security. He also declared that the UNO was founded on religious principles and got applause when he stated, with great deliberation that "the United States will support the charter; the United States will defend the charter; the United States will seek to expand and perfect the charter; and we are confident that all other member nations expect to do the same."

President Truman ended his fifteen minute address with a plea for the destitute people of the world. "We can't feed them all," he said, "but we can go a long way in doing it if you want to cooperate and do it." It was a forthright and appealing address, solidly based on religious principles, delivered with a good deal of social passion which got a deserving response from the delegates. Certainly it was a welcome relief to the general pessimism of the other addresses and the reports of committees. The President proved himself a man of faith in addressing the top-ranking men of faith.

MILLIONS SOUGHT FOR EUROPE

New York (RNS):—America's Protestant churches will be asked to contribute $14,500,000 over a four-year period to aid in the spiritual and material rebuilding of Europe's Christian communities, Robbins W. Barstow, director of the commission for world council service, revealed here on his return from Geneva where he attended meetings with commission leaders. Of the amount sought, Barstow said, $2,000,000 will be allotted to direct relief measures such as food, clothing and other material aid, and $12,500,000 for spiritual rehabilitation. Under this latter category funds and supplies will be distributed for educational training, libraries, literature, pastors' salaries, rebuilding of churches, evangelism and allied works.

YOUTH SERVICE IN BOSTON

Boston:—Trinity Church here was filled the evening of March 3 for a service of the young people's fellowship of the diocese, with over 100 parishes represented. The Rev. George O. Ekwall, chairman of the diocesan department on youth, preached.

CONFERENCE SUPPORTS WORKERS

Detroit (RNS): — Support of organized labor in demands "consistent with religious ideals" was pledged at the close of the four day conference of various Church groups meeting here with representatives of labor. The resolution listed as labor's objectives adequate wages and new and higher minimum wage laws, full employment legislation, paid vacations for all workers, and enlarged social security and public health activities.

Another resolution called for support of efforts against discriminatory treatment of minority groups, especially in public housing and in the public schools. The conference also demanded immediate cessation of atomic bomb manufacture, and the granting of full control of the bomb to UNO.

Sounding the conference keynote —closer cooperation between religion and labor for industrial and international peace — the Rev. Charles C. Webber, field representative of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers called for more decisive action by the Churches on economic issues. He urged strong Church support for the McMahon bill to control the atomic bomb, the Murray-Wagner Dingell bill to raise minimum wages to at least 65 cents an hour, the Missouri Valley Authority bill, and other legislation for development of regional areas.

Charles Webber, Methodist minister who is now a labor organizer, urges Church to work for social aims

The Church League for Industrial Democracy was represented at the conference, which was attended by about 300 church men and women, by the newly elected executive secretary, the Rev. W. B. Spofford Jr., the Rev. Malcolm Dade, rector of St. Cyprian's, Detroit, who was on the organizing committee, and the Rev. Robert Cook, a recent graduate of the theological school of the University of the South who is at present doing graduate work at the Episcopal Theological School.

EDITORIALS

All One Struggle

THE scene in Washington when an indifferent Congress and an apathetic citizenry allowed the Fair Employment Practice legislation to be filibustered to death, presents an issue and a challenge which must be met. The men who lined up as the vocal and voting opposition to this legislation to outlaw job discrimination represent the forces most to be feared in the worldwide struggle for peace and security. They are the same people who are out to crush trade unions and to hold down the living standards of America's workers. They hold to the same company in every issue involving the freedom of the people.

We are not faced with a series of separate struggles, as we might gather from the newspapers as we read of racial difficulties; anti-Semitism; the stoning of a Nisei as he returns home after serving with distinction with our army in Italy; the epidemic of strikes and proposed anti-strike legislation; questions of oil; American soldiers aiding one side in China's civil war. The fighting is on many fronts but it is all one struggle, with the enemy of the people appearing in strange ways and guises.

It is our giant corporations trying to throttle the self-hood of industrial workers; it is the poll-taxer trying to dominate and exploit the life of the Negro; it is the few with large money power and special privileges determined to hold that power and those privileges even though it means economic, social and political serfdom for the many. The coalition is strong, ready to throw its weight against any who assert that there must be equality—social, political and economic. It has won for now a battle in Congress. By means of a filibuster the Negro, for awhile longer, is to be held to menial jobs; ghettoes of employment are to be maintained for the Jew.

The battle between big business and the American worker is a part of this struggle. And the issue is deeper than an hourly wage increase or the refusal of General Motors to show its books or its refusal to act favorably on the union's proposal that their differences be made a matter of arbitration. It is an assault against all that democracy means to the heart of our nation and the life of the world. The defeat of organized labor would mean that America will not be able to make the needed contribution a true democracy can make to the family of nations; it would mean that power here is in the hands of the fascist-minded; it would mean that minorities will have no place, no self-hood, in our American plan; it would mean a body blow to the security of all mankind.

"QUOTES"

THE hope for world government, useful as a guiding principle, cannot be turned into a program for immediate action without very serious confusion of aim. Although improvement of the United Nations Organization is imperative, world government in any literal sense of the term is not attainable and rigid insistence of full world government now is in effect a vote for continued international anarchy. It is better to start with the imperfect accomplishments and promises of the provisional forms of co-operation that have actually begun to take shape and earnestly to seek their improvement.

—from the report on Atomic Warfare and the Christian Faith, presented at the meeting of the Federal Council of Churches, March 5th.

Let Jesus Say It!

A LENTEN fast, serving the double purpose of disciplining one's spiritual life and providing food for the hungry people of Europe and Asia, is but one of the disciplines which can be undertaken with benefit both for ourselves and for the kingdom of God. Another interesting form of discipline is suggested by the story in the gospel for Lent II. (Prayer Book p. 128). A Canaanitish woman appealed to Jesus to heal her afflicted daughter. This embarrassed Jesus' disciples. They did not like her,—she was a foreigner,—and they resented her coming to Jesus for help. Jesus handled the situation with skill and humor. With a merry twinkle in his eye for the woman, he said (out loud so his disciples could hear how they sounded) the very things they were thinking in their hearts. I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel. It is not meet to take the children's bread and cast it to dogs. Hearing their selfish, sectarian prejudices come from the mouth of the Master enabled the disciples to see these prejudices in a new light.

Why not try this Lent to put into the mouth of Jesus some of the resentment and prejudices we harbor deep within our hearts? Test our thoughts by putting them into the mouth of Christ. Imagine him saying, Why should I help the people in Europe when there is so much need in this country? Imagine Jesus saying, Why should we upset the peace and serenity of our dear old Church by pressing the matter of Church Unity? Let Jesus say, There is always going to be war in this world, so why should we concern ourselves with the UNO and with those things which make for a just and durable peace? Imagine Jesus voicing our bitter attitudes. O How I hate those Russians or the Negroes or the Jews or the Germans or the Japanese or the labor leaders, or the factory managers. To put such thoughts into the mouth of Jesus is not to solve the problems they suggest but it is to make clear how repugnant such attitudes are to the spirit of Jesus and the spirit of those who profess to love and honor him. Christ did not die for Episcopalians or Christians only, but for all men, even the people we do not like. A helpful Lenten discipline might be the bringing of our fears and hates and resentments under the light and love of Christ.

Reform the House of Deputies

by Sidney E. Sweet

Dean of Christ Church Cathedral, St. Louis

THE sessions of the House of Deputies of our General Convention have become quite inefficient, unsatisfactory, and depressing. We have gotten into ruts and it is time that we got out of them. Here are some practical suggestions for improvement in procedure, and no doubt others can be added to the list.

First, joint commission reports should be considered, without change, as soon as organization of the House is completed. This would do away with the unnecessary waste of time at the beginning of Convention. Sometimes for a day or more the House of Deputies is told that because committees are not ready to report is is necessary to adjourn. Hundreds of men away from their churches or their businesses, living at their own or at diocesan expense, are told to twiddle their thumbs because of the archaic theory that every commission report must be submitted to a committee of the House of Deputies before it is discussed or acted upon. This is silly. There is no reason why the reports of the commissions of our National Church should not be brought into the Convention on the very first day if there is no other business to perform. These commission reports ought not to be changed by committees anyway. Joint commissions are composed of bishops, clergy, and laity who have given much time to the preparation of their reports, and they are supposed to report to General Convention, not to the committee on canons of the House of Deputies. Our committees have to act very hastily, without comparable knowledge or thought, and their changes are likely to muddy the waters. Let us avoid delay; let us take up the report of the joint commission on Holy Matrimony or the report of the joint commission on Approaches to Unity, or perhaps the reports of some other important commissions, and waste no time.

Second, appointments to committees and commissions should be made with more adequate information than has heretofore been accessible about suitable men. I am not sure how these appointments have been made in the past, but it is my impression that for the most part they have been made by the secretary of the Convention. Probably he is the most competent man available. However, I understand that he will resign and that a new secretary will have to be chosen. It seems to me that it is ridiculous to expect any man to know all the deputies to the Convention or their special abilities to be of service in particular fields. It would be far more efficient to set up a committee composed of men from different parts of the country whose duty it would be to find out something about the deputies and give intelligent advice to the presiding officer so that appointments could be made on the basis of interest and merit. Such a committee would be of very great use if it were functioning between Conventions and took the time to find out who were most competent to serve on various committees.

Third, some plan for the payment of expenses of deputies to the Convention should be adopted. As in the past, I make this appeal in the name of justice. I come from the diocese of Missouri which, being centrally located, is always within reasonable distance of the place of meeting. It was only a jump to Kansas City, and a hop, skip and a jump to Cincinnati and Cleveland. But think of the deputies who come from Washington, Oregon, Arizona, New Mexico, and other distant places! Either the deputies must personally bear the rather heavy expense of attending Convention, or their dioceses are most unjustly and disproportionately taxed. Often it is impossible for distant dioceses which are not wealthy to have the full representation of their clergy and laity. One reason we do not have more young laity present at our Conventions is that many of the dioceses do not pay the expenses for laymen. There is no reason why this matter should always be referred to the finance committee and killed there. It ought to be discussed in Convention, and if passed, the finance committee should be instructed to find a way to put it into operation. Other Churches do it, and so can we. If all the dioceses now paying the expenses of their deputies would put the same amount into a common fund, probably out of that common fund all of the deputies from all of the dioceses of the Church could be given a reasonable amount for mileage and a reasonable amount for daily expenses while in attendance at the Convention sessions. Obviously in order to be completely fair a plan for apportioning the total expense among all dioceses should be devised. If some dioceses wished to make special appropriations for the comfort of their deputies, they would be free to do so. This would be in the interest of a more efficient Convention.

FOURTH, commissions should be instructed to have their reports printed before January 1st of the year in which General Convention is to be held, and these reports should be sent at least to the bishops and to the secretaries of the dioceses so that every diocesan convention might have the privilege of discussing them. Delegates would then come to the General Convention not only knowing the mind of their respective dioceses but also understanding fairly well the issues to be voted upon. Of course it would be better still if these reports could go to all clergy and wardens, but probably that would be too expensive. It would be a grand thing if these reports could be discussed at annual parish meetings as well as at diocesan conventions. If parish meetings and diocesan conventions really dealt with the vital questions which face the Church, there would be much greater interest shown in the meetings, and there would be more intelligent Church members. I remember one General Convention where some layman did not know the meaning of "intinction," and it was not very long ago that the House of Bishops voted in favor of the translation of bishops, but the House of Deputies voted it down without any consideration. Obviously the clerical and lay deputies had not thought to any great extent about the reasons which prompted the bishops to favor such a plan. The bishops ought to know whether it would be a good thing or not. Most of them realize that staying too long in one diocese means that they get into ruts, and most of them are aware that it would be a good thing for the Church if a competent bishop in a small diocese might ultimately be elected to a larger one. Most of them also realize that if we are going to elect any young bishops at all, there ought to be some method of translation or in such cases the bishop will become very tired of his job, and the diocese very tired of the bishop long before he reaches the last ten years of his episcopate.

Fifth, there should be more speed in routine matters and less limitation of debate on vital questions. If the suggestion presented in a preceding paragraph were adopted, the deputies to Convention would be much better prepared for the discussions of real issues, and the whole debate would be on a much higher plane than it has been in the past. Under our present system it takes a long time and many speeches to bring out everything that is involved in some of the complex questions. Often the deputies are resentful be-

FOR LENTEN DISCUSSION

EACH week during Lent we will present a number of questions based on articles featured in the series: Issues Before General Convention. Rectors or other discussion leaders we hope will find them helpful but we suggest that they add to them or make up their own questions. We add that authors are alone responsible for their contributions. the views expressed not necessarily being those of the editors.

1. Two important matters to come before General Convention are the marriage canon and unity with the Presbyterian Church. Do you think these matters should be discussed early in the Convention without the reports of the commissions going first to a committee?
2. How are deputies at present appointed to commissions and committees? Discuss other possible methods.
3. Should the expenses of deputies be pooled? It is often charged that the General Convention "is a rich man's convention." Are there grounds for this and if so how could it be corrected?
4. Does your parish ever consider matters to come before Convention? Where would you get information on issues in advance of Convention?
5. Should debate be limited? How could this be done fairly and democratically?
6. Is the present method of voting fair? How could it be changed?
7. Do you agree that defeating or blocking legislation by parliamentary tactics is "neither good sportsmanship nor good religion"? Just what is meant by parliamentary tactics? Give examples of the practice.

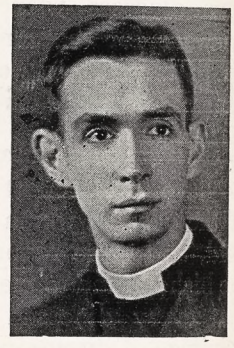
cause debate is cut short while they still feel that they have not heard the matter threshed out. Sometimes it would be possible for those in favor of a resolution to select qualified speakers, and those opposed to the resolution to follow the same course; careful preparation could then be made by those chosen to address Convention.

Sixth, the method of counting a vote by orders should be changed. Our present method is most unfair. A very small minority of deputies can thwart the will of the whole convention. To show how utterly unjust and unreasonable our present system is, let me put a hypothetical case. If 80 dioceses were represented by 4 clerical deputies each, and all voted for a resolution, that would be 320 votes in the affirmative. If 40 of these dioceses were represented by 4 lay deputies each, all of whom voted in the affirmative, that would be 160 more "ayes." If the other 40 dioceses were represented by 2 lay deputies each, one of whom voted in the affirmative and one in the negative, making a "divided vote," these 40 divided lay votes would prevent a majority in the lay order in favor of the resolution, thus defeating it. In other words, though 520 were in favor of it and only 40 opposed to it, the resolution would be lost. Of course this is an extreme illustration. It would never happen in just this way. But it could happen, and it does happen time after time that the will of a fairly large majority is frustrated. This method of counting votes is absolutely unreasonable and ought to be abolished. I wonder how it ever got started. When a vote by orders is taken, divided votes should be counted as one-half vote for each side. If in order to protect the constitution we want to give a minority some unusual power, let us do it in some sensible fashion, and agree that on constitutional questions there must be a two-thirds affirmative vote of the clergy and of the laity in attendance in order to effect a change.



Seventh, and most important, there should be less parliamentary law and more good sportsmanship and Christian spirit. Of course it is necessary for the Convention to be conducted on the basis of parliamentary law. It is not, however, necessary that there should be so much confusion aroused by parliamentary tactics. It is a lot of fun to match wits and try to win a point by smart parliamentary means, but it is not good sportsmanship nor good religion, and most of the deputies do not know what is happening when parliamentary tangles develop. The large majority want to know what is the mind of their fellow deputies, and would like to have matters of importance to the whole Church voted on, not sidetracked. The Convention exists to legislate for a Christian Church, and in spite of strong personal convictions and deep feelings, it should be possible for its members to take action without ill will or resentment. If zeal for the advancement of our Christian cause and the extension of the Kingdom of God were uppermost in the minds of us all to a greater extent, and the spirit of Christ were more in evidence in debates and discussions than it has been in the past, surely we would accomplish more at General Convention and derive greater inspiration from it.

The Living Liturgy

The Penitential Office

EVERY Ash Wednesday we renew our acquaintance with the Penitential Office in the Prayer Book, then lay it aside to gather dust for another year. We do this, not simply because Ash Wednesday is the day of penitence par excellence in the Christian Year, but because only the emotional overtones of the first day of Lent make it possible for us to say the office with full sincerity. This is a pity. For it is of utmost importance that a service of penitence be a constituent part of our common prayer. Without repentance we cannot believe the gospel, must less enter the Kingdom of God.

It is true that our other Prayer Book offices make much allowance for our confession of sin, and the Daily Offices and the Holy Communion provide us with becoming forms (though the latter has a few antiquated expressions). When we consider seriously the misery of common men wide-spread throughout the world, brought on by international, fratricidal strife; the futility of a divided Church preaching unity and concord to a divided world; the appalling scientific skill of our society, uncontrolled by any commensurate moral capacity; the beclouded prospects of human welfare in the mad "getting and spending" of economic man; the deep racial antagonisms which seem embedded, as it were, in our original sin;—when we consider these things before God we know that His Church, if it is to be a witnessing Church, must also be a penitent Church. The burden of these things is, or ought to be, intolerable.

Copyright 2020. Archives of the Episcopal Church / DFMS. Permission required for reuse and publication.

Our present Penitential Office is inadequate to meet this recurrent need of the Church. It is negative. It breathes more the spirit of the Old Testament than of the New. It affords us no resolve to amend our ways, no assurance of pardon. The final blessing (an Old Testament one) comes abruptly without any preceding declaration of absolution. The service is repetitious, as though God hears us for our "much speaking." The antiphon said by minister and people together says the same thing as the prayer preceding; and the first and last collect duplicate each other. It should be said, however, that the office was originally intended to be used immediately before the Holy Communion, and its negative qualities were to be balanced by the more positive graces of the sacrament. A consideration of its origin also explains the faulty structure of the office—that is, the Lord's Prayer is in an illogical, non-climactic position. Our American form is the tail end of the English Commination service, whose terrible cursings and wrathful exhortations we are fortunately spared.

Another difficulty with our office is that it is too non-specific. It is a superb example of that "pump-priming," of which we had occasion to speak several weeks ago in connection with some of our hymns. But there are no buckets provided to receive the copious tears of our weeping so that we can water the waste places of our spiritual life. Most people need some very concrete and particular suggestions when making an examination of conscience. It is no use trying to feel "grieved and wearied with the burden of our sins" unless we have a clear notion of what the sins are. A Litany of Recollection (such as the excellent one included in Occasional Offices, compiled by the late Dean Rousmaniere of St. Paul's Cathedral, Boston) would be far more helpful for "a broken and contrite heart" than what is now offered us in the Penitential Office.

A thorough reworking of the Penitential Office, to make it more positive in tone and more precise in content, would have two very much needed uses. One would be as a preparation service for the Holy Communion; the other, as a form to be used in the confessional, either in whole or in part. Whatever may be his views about the place and importance of the sacrament of penance, a clergyman is expected to administer it when it is desired. The Roman form so widely used contains doctrinal elements which are in flat contradiction with the teaching of the Prayer Book. It would be a great boon to a penitent coming to make a confession to be able to open his Prayer Book to a form officially recognized by his Church—for after all he is confessing his sins to the Church as well as to God. Lastly, in revising the office let us do a little more editing of Psalm 51 (surely the best thing in the service), by cutting out verse 5, which is not true, and verse 16, which is irrelevant.

By
WILLIAM B. SPOFFORD, JR.

A REPUBLICAN nominee for president, possessed of a healthy conscience, is the leading character in the lively comedy, State of the Union, by Howard Lindsay and Russel Crouse. Grant Matthews, a Willkie-type member of the G.O.P., is taken under the wing of the back-room politicians and, through careful publicity and grooming, is built up as a prospective occupant of the White House. Naturally, American politics being what they are, he has to take short-cuts and make commitments in order to get the party's nod. Surrounded by auto magnates, isolationist columnists, reactionary publishers and anti-democratic politicians, Matthews finds himself trapped by his commitments. Luckily, he has a jealous wife who likes her liquor. At a caucus party, she gets drunk and, in her capacity as Matthew's conscience, flays the persons who hold the reins on her husband. The nomination goes up in a puff and the sweet breeze of honesty re-enters Matthew's soul.

On this frame-work, the authors of the perennial, Life With Father, have woven a lively satire on American political life. The play is written in a synthetic style which perpetually seeks the opportunity for the good, old-fashioned wise-crack. The openings come often and all leading political figures—Truman, Hoover, Taft, Ickes, Bilbo—are verbally stabbed. As a result, the play offers an interesting commentary on the state of our nation's soul — a commentary that is well worth any person's evening.

Two of the gibes stand out. A Republican senator, asked what is the true difference between the Democratic and Republican parties, replies: "All the difference in the world. They are in and we are out." And a Southern Democrat attending the Republican caucus states: "We are proud Democrats down south and you people can't say anything too mean about the administration to suit us." Touche, Mr. Bilbo.

The trouble with the play is that one knows only too well that this is the style in which our peoples' government works. Weeks of argument on Pauley and Pearl Harbor plus a costly filibuster while atom bomb stock piles mount up. State of the Union is good comedy marked with a frightening picture of reality. It gives a good argument why the Church and Church members should be concerned with politics.

Talking It Over

By
W. B. SPOFFORD

PEOPLE can say I crab the R. & A. Fund but they'd be wrong, on the record. I'll quote c. & v. since the fund got under way if anyone wants. But to be for it doesn't mean that anyone has to keep quiet when he thinks something needs to be said.

There was a time, a few years back, when the Church officially thought that war was an awful business. Resolutions were passed that "war is murder on a colossal scale"; "war is degrading, brutal, bestial, like the devil, the father of lies and hatred"; "we believe that as the Christian conscience has condemned infanticide and slavery and torture, it is now called to condemn war as an outrage on the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of all mankind." We also told young men that if their consciences told them that they should have nothing to do with war we, as a Church, would stand back of them. Of course we didn't. World War II came and the Episcopal Church as a whole went all out for it. I believed then, and now, that the Church was right. I also believed, then and now, that the Church should have stood solidly back of those men who had conscientious objections to war. That we let them down is a matter of record. The payoff came one day at a National Council meeting when an argument went on for hours as to whether or not we should contribute a few hundred dollars to help maintain an interdenominational office in Washington, set up to see that CO's got some degree of justice. The answer was no.

So an unofficial organization, the Episcopal Pacifist Fellowship, went to work to do what it could as a tiny band to help these boys. They raised a bit to help this office in Washington; to help the CO's in camps and their families left behind. They were not able to do much—most of the aid to CO's who were Episcopalians, to our shame, came from Quakers and similar sects. The Episcopal Church just didn't believe in "conscience," regardless of what we had previously said, once war started.

WE ARE still playing the game the same way. The Episcopal Pacifist Fellowship—and I repeat, I never have and do not now agree with their absolutist position on war—thinks, rightly I believe, that the Church has an obligation. It still seeks money to help these CO's, both those still in civilian camps and also those being discharged who have no GI Bill of Rights to aid them in adjusting to civilian life.

But Mr. Robert Jordon, in charge of the Reconstruction and Advance Fund drive, fearful lest the few dollars that might be raised would take that much away from the $8,800,000 that is sought, tells the pacifists to lay off any money raising at this time. And they are doing just that—maybe because they are pacifists. That's their business but it does seem to me that they might well tell Mr. Jordon that men are more important than brick and mortar; that it is more important to back up these young men who did what their consciences told them was right, however much we may disagree with them, than it is to build a cathedral in Manila or churches in China.

Kimber Den and his great work in China is another case in point. Here is a man, one of the great men of our day, who gave up a secure position where he had won a world-wide reputation, to establish centers where children orphaned by the war could be cared for. The work expanded until not only children but hundreds of adults are looked after in centers that are largely cooperative and self-sustaining. Yet letters come to the CLID, which over a period of years has tried to help Kimber Den in this work through the contributions of members and WITNESS readers, that the word is being passed around that people had better forget Kimber Den for awhile and devote themselves entirely to the R. & A. Fund.

Well, the R. & A. Fund is out for nearly ten million dollars, with over six million already in the bank or pledged. That's fine. So I hope Mr. Jordon will forgive me if, as secretary of the CLID for a time longer, I keep right on trying to gather in four or five thousand dollars a year to help keep alive the children of China so that a bit later on they will be around to say their prayers in the churches the R. & A. Fund, quite properly, plans to rebuild.

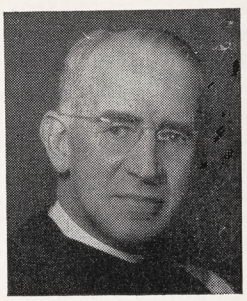
Youth for Christ Tours Europe With Big Mass Meetings

Torrey Johnson Reveals That Invitation To Germany Came From Martin Niemoeller

Edited by Sara Dill

Chicago:—Four representatives of Youth for Christ, a fundamentalist group and some contend a fascist group, will fly from here to London on March 18 for a six-week speaking tour of Europe.

The group will fly to London from the municipal airport here on an American Airlines Constellation plane and are scheduled to land in England Tuesday, March 19, at noon with a rally scheduled for the same evening in London's historic Royal Albert Hall. On the six-week tour the clergymen plan to visit Germany, France, Sweden and other countries.



Described as a campaign "to light up the spiritual blackout among the youth of Europe," the tour is aimed at bringing converts to European Protestantism.

One of the four is Torrey Johnson, founder of the Chicagoland Youth for Christ. Those interested in Pastor Martin Niemoeller of Germany, who is at present playing a great part in the World Council of Churches, may be interested to know that Johnson, in speaking last fall to Congregational ministers in Chicago, announced that he had received a letter from Niemoeller "telling us he was very much interested in Youth for Christ and asking us to help him start such a movement in Germany." He showed the letter to a number of ministers following the meeting. Johnson also told the ministers that "We also have correspondence from Chiang Kai-Shek asking us for more help in furthering Christian work in China. A number of missionaries have been taken there at government expense. As everyone knows, the Chinese government is the most Christian government in the world."

Johnson further told the ministers that "We like publicity, the more we can get the better we like it. The Herald-American has a wonderful editorial page. You know Mr. Hearst is getting quite old and one of these days will be meeting his maker. He believes in our work."

HUMAN RELATIONS COMMISSION

New York (RNS):—The Protestant Council of New York has announced the formation here of a human relations commission which will deal with matters of applied religion. In its first action, the new group praised President Truman's plan for reduced food consumption in the U. S. Robert W. Searle, executive secretary, explained the commission's functions were "to give leadership to the more than 1,500,000 Protestants of New York in bringing Christian principles to bear on human issues." At present the new group is composed of 29 theologians, educators, and business men, but that number eventually will be increased to 35. The Rt. Rev. Charles K. Gilbert, suffragan bishop of New York, is chairman of the body.

BISHOP GILBERT

Searle said that at its next meeting, Mar. 21, the commission will discuss elimination of racial discrimination from colleges in New York state, expediting of the slum clearance plan of the citizen's housing council, and care of neglected, dependent, and delinquent children in New York. A special sub-committee has been appointed to explore Protestant responsibilities in the field of industrial and labor situations.

Veterans Seminar

Berkeley, Calif.:—A unique seminar, where the faculty learns from the students, has been set up at the Church Divinity School of the Pacific. It is a veterans' seminar, in which are discussed the implications of the war experiences of students who were both regular members of the armed forces and chaplains. The task of the faculty is to ask questions and to listen; the task of the veterans is to talk of their interpretations of what they saw and heard.

The seminar has an outline, but every subject under the sun comes into the discussion. What did the men think of the chaplains? What were the basic religious attitudes of the men under fire, in the hospital, on the way home? What were the types of religious crises? What effect did the atomic bomb have on religious thinking? Was there any noticeable change in religious practices? How were religious services attended? What was the general moral level of the men? Was there any race discrimination? Did military life have any deteriorating effect on morals? What qualities made an effective chaplain? What has the war done to you? What was the attitude of the military and the government toward religion, church, and morals? How can these experiences be used by the church in the post-war world? What can the seminary do to meet the new situations facing the post-war church and world?

Leader of the seminar is Dean Henry H. Shires, assisted by Professors Randolph C. Miller, Pierson Parker, and Charles F. Whiston. The aid of the Rev. P. M. Casady, who had the longest combat experience of any chaplain in the African-European campaign, has added to the value of the sessions.

GET-TOGETHER

*The rector of an attractive parish on the Pacific Coast has been granted a leave of absence for one year starting in September. He is looking for a clergyman to take charge during that time. The salary is $3,000 and a comfortable rectory. The churchmanship is low. The community is near many points of interest and itself offers many educational and other advantages. Anyone interested should write Get-Together, THE WITNESS, 135 Liberty Street, New York 6, N. Y., enclosing a stamped addressed envelope. The purpose of this department is to aid parishes needing rectors or assistants, or men seeking positions, to Get-Together. We mean to do what our limited time allows with the understanding that we are not running a professional employment agency. We do what we can to Get-Together men and available jobs. At the moment we have on the list a number of men seeking positions; also a number of parishes seeking men, mostly assistants. We gladly send the available information to those who write us in some detail about their needs—churchmanship, part of country, salary, etc.

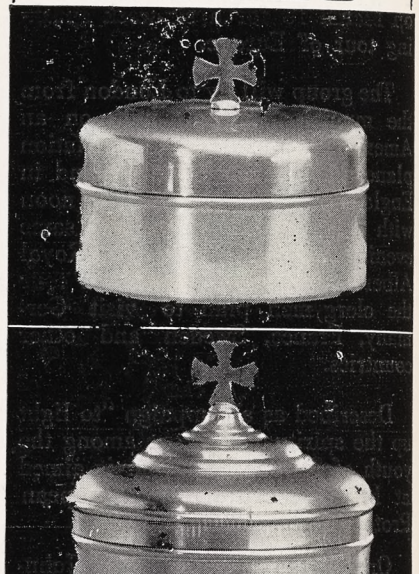
Provide Movies

Burlington, Vt.:—The educational committee of St. Paul's here recognizing that children either go to movies on Saturday afternoon or want to, is now showing first-rate pictures for them at that time. "We expected about 100 the first afternoon," says the rector, the Rev. Charles Martin, "but over 200 showed up." Ten cents is charged which covers the costs.

Conference Center

Boston: — The diocese of Massachusetts has a conference center for adults. It is the estate of Robert H. Storer, Christ Church, Needham, who has offered the use of 160 acres, with adequate buildings and cabins near Lake Winnepesaukee, N. H. which will take care of 100 guests. Archdeacon H. L. Johnson is in charge, with several conferences already arranged for this summer and fall. Vacation opportunities will also be given, particularly for young couples with small children.

Caribbean Conference



Kingston, Jamaica:—The Rev. R. O. C. King, chaplain to the Archbishop of the West Indies of the Church of England, writes THE WITNESS that the two week conference of leaders of the American and English Churches held here last month was "unprecedented" and "will have a lasting effect for good upon the future progress of the Church" in the Caribbean. Among the matters discussed was the allocation of money raised by the West Indies appeal of the Church of England; the future of Codrington College in Barbados which may become a theological college for the area; the desirability of closer fellowship between the two Churches in the work of the area. Representing the Episcopal Church were Bishop Creighton of Michigan, Bishop Colmore of Puerto Rico, Bishop Boynton of Puerto Rico, Bishop Voegli of Haiti, Bishop Blankinship of Cuba and Bishop Gooden of the Canal Zone. Representing the Church of England, in addition to representatives from Jamaica, the Windward Islands, Barbados, Antigua, Nassau and Honduras, where two representatives of the Archbishop of Canterbury, Archdeacon Bradfield of Croydon, and Canon E. C. Rich of Peterborough.

Predicts Unity

Sydney, Australia (wireless to RNS):—An Australian committee for the World Council of Churches was formally inaugurated at a meeting here at which Anglican Dean William Leslie Langley of Melbourne predicted "the ultimate cooperation of all non-Roman churches in Australia." The new group, plans for which have been under discussion for the past two years, will be somewhat similar to the American committee in New York.

"The Australian-wide organization for united action by all Protestant churches," Langley declared, "comes as a great movement toward world unity, giving fresh hope to the Christians of our generation."

The speaker regretted, however, he said, the "parochial attitude" which prevented the Roman Catholic Church in Australia from being represented in the new Australian movement. He asserted that complete Christian unity "will be unobtainable as long as the Roman Catholic Church claims to be the exclusive Church of Jesus Christ."

Dean Langley's statement later brought a reply from the Rev. Leslie Rumble, M.S.C., who denied that the Catholic Church lacks enthusiasm for joint Christian movements. He declared that "Catholic fidelity does not preclude charity toward others," but added that "it is the duty of Catholics to abstain from non-Catholic religious rites, since they believe their religion is above all others."

Hit Segregation

San Francisco (RNS):—"Could Jesus live in your neighborhood?"

That challenging question opens a pamphlet concerning residential "restrictive covenants" against non-Caucasians, issued by the interracial commission of the San Francisco Council of Churches. The pamphlet is being distributed through member churches of the Council, and urges readers to sign the following commitment:

"Recognizing that residential segregation directed against non-Caucasians increases racial tensions, attacks the foundations of democracy and is fundamentally un-Christian, I pledge that in no way will I legally bind any property by signing restrictive covenants directed against persons because of race, color or creed."

The pamphlet was prepared by Rev. Alfred G. Fisk, chairman of the commission, in cooperation with Hughbert Landram, secretary of the San Francisco Council of Churches; and Rev. William Turner of the Community Baptist church.

The pamphlet appeared as white house owners belonging to the Portola Heights Boosters Club were in a controversy to oust a Filipino and a Chinese family from their homes on Bridgeview Drive where restrictions forbid residence to "persons other than of the white, Caucasian race."

Educational Workers

Washington:—Bishop Angus Dun of Washington, as chairman of the National Council's division of Christian education, has announced that chairmen of diocesan departments and professional religious educators, will meet in Chicago, May 21-23. The group, about 75 persons, predominantly clergy, will consider a syllabus prepared by the division which aims to state the knowledge and experience which the Church seeks to bring to children and suggests the progressive steps, year by year, by which the goal might be reached.

One of the matters that will be discussed is whether or not the Episcopal Church should establish an official publishing house, similar to that of the Methodist and other Churches. If this was acted upon favorably it presumably would mean that the plant would take over all the inaugural and in an address that was broadcast called attention to St. Andrew's contribution to the city's recreation program and the contribution that all other churches can make.

Once the speeches were out of the way the evening belonged to the young folk. To the latest popular recorded tunes, 300 boys and girls, and a few service men, danced or crowded around the Coke Bar for soft drinks.

The Rev. John Large, rector of the church, described the setting, and extended an invitation to all of the city's young people to attend on future Fridays. Allan J. Henry, senior warden, said, "We hope those who enjoy the Shuffle Shack will show their appreciation by having a good time."

Other speakers included David G. Kennedy, senior adviser, and Michael Harris, president of the Wilmington youth council.

Before the end of the broadcast, carried by WDEL and made possible by a contribution of its weekly time by the Junior Chamber of Commerce, Harvey Smith, master of ceremonies, interviewed several boys and girls in the crowd for their reaction —all favorable. Six of the church's young people conceived the idea of the canteen, promptly dubbed the Shuffle Shack, several weeks ago. With the aid of several adults the young people's committee went to work on the large room. They obtained needed furniture, including an ice chest for keeping soft drinks cool.

Current plans call for opening the canteen one night a week. Later, with the formation of a boys' club, it is hoped to make the rendezvous, equipped with ping pong tables, a pool table and shuffle board, available more frequently, perhaps at regular hours every day.

E.T.S. Alumni Day

Cambridge, Mass.: — Francis C. M. Wei was the headliner at the mid-winter alumni day of the Episcopal Theological School, observed February 27th, with approximately 150 present. The day started with a quiet morning conducted by the Rev. Charles W. Lowry, rector at Chevy Chase, Md. Following a luncheon given by Dean and Mrs. Taylor, the Rev. William J. Wolf, instructor in theology, presented a paper on Problems of Theology in the New Age. A memorial service for the late Prof. James A. Muller was conducted by Dean Taylor, Prof. Hatch, Bishop Sherrill, with former dean Henry B. Washburn preaching. Dean Arthur Lichtenberger of Newark, chairman of the editorial board of THE WITNESS, was the chairman of the dinner meeting which closed the day. Dean Taylor announced that 26 new students entered the school in February; 16 juniors and all war veterans; 3 seniors, 1 middler and 2 special students. The student body now numbers 57.

IN MEMORIAM

The untimely death of Helen Washburn has taken from us a leader of unusual vision and ability. Hers was a rare combination of the gifts of courage and tenderness, of vigor and gentleness, of conviction and tolerance, of deep devotion and dynamic action. There was a quality of happy radiance and vitality about her, of intuitive understanding and compassion which endeared her to the hearts of people from every walk of life and across every line of religious belief. In all that she did there was a sense of urgency, a high purpose, a compelling and tireless spirit which knew no despair, a willingness to give and to hazard all because her faith was strong.

Those who knew and worked with her sensed the timeless quality of her friendship and caught from her the intimations of life's challenge and its greatness. The consciousness of personal loss felt by those of us who have been privileged to know her and to work with her cannot be put into words. Her personal acts of kindness, her steadfast courage, her belief in the goodness of people, her happy and wholesome laughter, her outgoing spirit of love, her unswerving loyalty, her joy in sacrificial service, these we shall hold dear always. Her faith, her ideals, her vision will continue to give us strength to carry on.

MR. A. R. CROSS
Layman of Philadelphia

A priest of the Church has just sent me a letter which I think may interest you. It is as he wrote it except for the elimination of names.

On a recent Sunday, being a visitor in ———, I went to the 11 a.m. service at the cathedral. As I had not been able to attend an earlier communion service, I was grateful for the opportunity of receiving the sacrament at that hour. The celebrant, I noticed, frequently gabbled the noble and meaningful phrases of the Prayer Book, so that they could be hardly heard or understood where I was. But as I knelt at the altar rail, I was completely unprepared to hear him say something that sounded like this: "ThbodyuvLord-JesusChristgivntheepreservbodysoulast i n glifepleaseconsumeitnow." By this time, he was two or three persons beyond me. For the space of a moment or two, I had held the wafer in my hand and was engaged in an act of silent devotion and prayer, which for particular reasons was very real to me. Suddenly it dawned on me what the celebrant had said. When the chalice was held to my lips by the priest following, I carefully dipped the tip of the wafer into the wine and placed it in my mouth. This is my custom. Having witnessed repeatedly for years the soiled condition of the chalice rim and lipstick smears on purificators, and having served in parishes during serious epidemics of colds and influenza, it is my rule, wherever I am, to receive the sacrament by intinction.

After the service, lay communicants who had knelt on my right at the altar rail told me that they had heard what the celebrant had said. One of them, a devout laymen, commented: "That service illustrates why there are such small congregations at the cathedral. The way in which the words were gabbled makes me want to stay away whenever Canon ..... is taking the service." I assured him that I had understood everything, and hoped that with the end of the war the cathedral would soon have a staff of highly qualified priests, including an outstanding preacher, so that more persons, residents and visitors, might be drawn within the hearing of the gospel and fill its vast spaces. Incidentally, I added that, as a visitor, I hoped also that all parishes in his diocese would hold in future an annual every member canvass, so that their support of the Church's program and world work would be more worthy of the size, importance and influence of such a metropolis. All in all, I told him, I thought that his diocese for years had set the poorest example of good churchmanship in the whole country.

E. W. AVERILL
Priest of Phoenix, Arizona

The earliest record of Christian worship is, I believe the Letter of Pliny the Younger, to the Emperor Hadrian, who says that it was the custom of Christians to assemble together, and sing a hymn to Christ as God. This has been an unbroken tradition in all parts of the Church, until 1928 when the General Convention permitted the substitution of the Benedictus Es, for the Te Deum, the Church's most glorious hymn of praise to Father, Son and Holy Spirit.

Many churches, and even cathedrals have availed themselves of this method of shortening the service by perhaps five minutes, and as a result Christian worship has disappeared from many of our churches. The Benedictus Es is a noble hymn and teaches us to worship God in the midst of the fiery furnace of affliction, as did the three mystical children, but it is not Christian worship. I doubt if one in a hundred ever thinks of its origin, when singing it on Sunday morning.

There is the suggestion of "a mighty salvation" if the Benedictus is used, but all three of the morning canticles are distinctly Hebraic. Why not restore the ancient tradition of Christian worship on Sunday mornings and sing a hymn to Christ as God?

W. M. PASCOE
Rector of St. Philip's, Grand Rapids, Mich.

I almost always agree with THE WITNESS but either there is no controversy about the rightness of priests picketing—that is the priest is an ordinary Christian and as such should act according to his sympathies and his own personal lights—or else he is a peculiar representative of the institution that is concerned with reconciling all men to God, in which case it's not "better for him to be wrong than a gutless hypocrite." Jesus was neither, nor should his representatives be. We are surrounded by injustices on all sides as was Jesus. The injustices are between men and can never be resolved until the spirit of Christ is impartially imparted to these men whether they be capitalists or fascists or sharecroppers. I can't see how this unique and undeniable end is served by the priest in the picket line.

JAMES L. SMILEY
Priest of Annapolis, Maryland

The ounce of prevention is far better than the pound of cure. Especially would this truth have been confirmed, had it been applied in 1898. Then the Spanish-American war could have been averted, if the Church had encouraged the federal government to exercise Christian statesmanship. But, unfortunately, both Church and state failed. And what unspeakable harvests of horror sprang from that colossal tragedy! Today a similar menace overshadows civilization. We are threatened with World War III. What now is our ounce of prevention? Simply this: to prepare for peace by outlawing war. Practically the very first thing to do is to demand that our federal government immediately inaugurate a United States of the World, with a constitution patterned after our own. Law would then supplant murderous force. Brotherhood would be hailed all over the earth and the desire of all nations would appear.

Can Require Bishops to Retire Says Majority Opinion

Four to One Vote by Committee of Bishops With Minority Report to Go to Convention

By W. B. Spofford

New York:—The General Convention will again have before it the matter of compulsory retirement of bishops at the age of seventy-two. Action was taken at the Convention of 1943 which was interpreted by some as making it mandatory for a bishop to resign from his jurisdiction on reaching that age. Others maintained that a bishop was elected by a diocese and was responsible to his diocese and that the national Church had nothing to say about whether or not he should retire, or at what age. So when the House of Bishops met last year at Birmingham, Ala., the Presiding Bishop was instructed to appoint a committee of five bishops, with himself a member and ex-officio chairman, "to prescribe such a procedure in the case of enforced resignations as will safeguard and promote the welfare of the Church the diocese and the bishop concerned."

In addition to Bishop Tucker, the committee consisted of Bishop R. Bland Tucker of Arkansas, Bishop Cameron J. Davis of Western New York, Bishop James P. DeWolfe of Long Island, Bishop Oliver J. Hart of Pennsylvania. The committee met October 31, 1945 and February 27, 1946 and also carried on extensive correspondence. The Presiding Bishop however announced on March 7 that the committee failed to agree and that therefore a majority and a minority report will come before the House of Bishops when it meets in September in Philadelphia. How the members of the committee voted was not announced. But it was stated that four members approved the majority report, one of whom did so because he thought it was the proper way to carry out the constitution of the Church but reserved the right to question the whole principle of compulsory retirement when the matter comes before the House of Bishops.

The majority opinion asserts that the General Convention has authority to require bishops to resign from their jurisdiction either by constitutional provision or by canon. It submits proposed canons which interpret the constitutional provision as meaning that resignations are not effective until accepted by formal action of the House of Bishops, but that such acceptance is mandatory. It provides also that jurisdiction is declared terminated if for any reason a bishop shall fail to tender his resignation when he has attained the age of seventy-two. The proposed canons expressly provide that the same action shall be taken in the case of suffragan bishops as with bishops of jurisdiction.

The minority report signed by one of the committee asserts that voluntary resignations are always presented to the standing committee of the diocese concerned before presentation to the House of Bishops, and that "in practice the diocese has always had the first say and its consent has been a condition on which the resignation has been presented to the House of Bishops . . . but in the case of enforced resignations it is quite conceivable that the diocese may with good reason wish to retain a bishop who is entirely competent, or give him an assistant. Yet if the procedure of the present canon is followed the diocese will have no authority whatever."

The minority report continues, saying that the diocese elected and thus conferred jurisdiction. It questions also the assertion of the majority report that acceptance of a resignation by the House of Bishops is mandatory. It submits amendments to the canons providing that "a bishop of a diocese or a bishop coadjutor or a suffragan bishop who desires to resign his jurisdiction or position, and every bishop who has attained or shall attain the age of seventy-two years shall send in writing to the Presiding Bishop and to the standing committee of his diocese his resignation of his jurisdiction. This communication shall be sent at least thirty days before the date set for a regular or special meeting of the House of Bishops. The Presiding Bishop shall without delay send a copy of the communication to every bishop of this Church having ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and shall at once appoint a committee of three bishops of the province of which the diocese concerned is a part, to confer with the resigning bishop and said standing committee as to the effective date of said resignation . . . which committee shall report to the next meeting of the House of Bishops which shall then give or withhold consent to the desires of the diocese. But in no case shall the effective date of the resignation be more than three years after the meeting of the House of Bishops at which the resignation is reported." Provision is made also for similar action in the case of missionary bishops, but without reference to the standing committee.

★ A chaplain with the rank of major will be available for a parish the first of April or shortly thereafter. He is over fifty, in perfect physical condition with ample energy and ambition. Churchmanship is moderate. . . . There is a thriving mission in a new housing development in an eastern city that offers unique opportunities. The church ministers to all Protestants by agreement with the federation of churches. At present there is a church house where services are held and a Sunday school of 150 children. Plans have been made for a church. The starting salary is $200 a month and rectory, with an unusual opportunity to grow with a thriving new community. . . . The purpose of this Get-Together is to bring parishes needing rectors or assistants and men seeking work together. In writing please give details and enclose a stamped addressed envelope. Address: Get-Together, THE WITNESS, 135 Liberty Street, New York 6, N. Y. This is not an employment agency but merely an effort to be of service. Please therefore do not call (time is the most precious thing we have) and do not expect personal correspondence. We will treat communications in confidence and will respond if, in our judgment, we have anything that meets your need.

Both the majority and minority reports have been sent to all bishops with a covering letter from the Presiding Bishop stating that they are sent "in order that time might be given for study and preliminary discussion."

Trenton, N. J.:—When the Rt. Rev. Alfred Banyard was consecrated suffragan bishop of the diocese of New Jersey last fall the bishops attending the service had this picture taken. We received it too late to use then. But we give it to you at this late date because we believe it shows how most Episcopalians like to see their bishops vested on such an occasion. Those in the picture, from left to right, are Bishop Littell, retired bishop of Honolulu; Bishop McKinstry of Delaware; Bishop Gray of Connecticut; Bishop Budlong of Connecticut; Bishop Gilbert of New York; Bishop Hart of Pennsylvania; Bishop Ludlow of Newark; Bishop Matthews, retired bishop of New Jersey; Bishop Conkling of Chicago; Bishop Washburn of Newark; Bishop H. St. George Tucker, the Presiding Bishop; Bishop Gardner of New Jersey; Bishop Stevens of Los Angeles.

Incidentally, in sending invitations to bishops to the service, Bishop Gardner suggested to them what vestments they should bring.

PARISH CONDUCTS UNIQUE CAMP

Wilkes-Barre, Pa.:—St. Stephen's parish here has plans well under way for this year's summer camp, located on a site of nearly 200 acres located on the Susquehanna River near Tunkhannock, Pa. It is a project in Christian democracy, with boys admitted from various economic, racial and social backgrounds. There are sons of college professors and foreign diplomats; there are sons of coal miners; there are boys whose parents were born in Japan and other countries. The entire camp program is planned so as to help youth and their parents know the differences in nationality and cultural and economic background, and that they can live together in a strengthening and creative fellowship. There are musical programs, dramatics, art classes, lectures, as well as the usual things that go on in a summer camp.

The rector of the parish, the Rev. William K. Russell, is still looking for a few counsellors. Anyone interested should write him at Wilkes-Barre.

CHURCH GROUP HITS AT CHURCHILL

Hartford, Conn. (RNS):—A statement refuting Winston Churchill's call for an Anglo-American alliance against the Soviet Union was issued here by the international relations committee of the Connecticut Council of Churches. The statement called for consideration of "the need for a continuing and growing mutual understanding between our country and Russia" by churches of the state in their services on the third Sunday in May, anniversary of the first Hague conference.

The committee asserted its belief "that the hope of peace is bound up with American-British-Soviet friendship and cooperation and that the call for an Anglo-American alliance against Russia is really a call for the restoration of a balance of power which undermines the United Nations Organization."

"It cannot be too strongly stated," the declaration added, "that to wreck American-British-Soviet friendship is to wreck the peace."

OLD KENTUCKY PARISH CELEBRATES

Lexington, Ky.:—As a highlight of the 150th anniversary of Christ Church here, the Rev. James W. Kennedy presented the largest confirmation class in the history of the parish to Bishop Moody on March 3rd. There were sixty adults and young people in it. The parish, oldest Episcopal Church west of the Alleghanies, plans to raise $150,000 in May for a chapel and an addition to the parish house.

NON-SEGREGATED CHURCH IS URGED

Columbus, Ohio (RNS):—"The time has come for the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America to unequivocally renounce the pattern of segregation in race relations as unnecessary and undesirable." This resolution was adopted here at a session of the committee on community tensions in connection with the special post-war meeting of the Federal Council to adopt new strategic policies.

Approval of the statement was preceded by frank and candid debate. Discussing segregation, W. W. Alexander of Chicago, vice-president of the Julius Rosenwald fund and chairman of the Federal Council's commission on the Church and minority peoples said: "It is clear that we have adopted the pattern of segregation. This is not sectional but national. There is about as much in one section of the country as another. This is so much in conflict with Christian teaching, that if we are dealing realistically, we must look at it as a national pattern. Less than one per cent of the Colored Protestants in the United States have any fellowship in worship with

Will W. Alexander tells the Federal Council that the Church is more segregated than the school system or organized labor their white brethren. The Church is more segregated than the school system or than organized labor."

Expression of the Negro viewpoint came from Benjamin Mays, vice-president of the Federal Council and president of Morehouse College, Alabama, who declared: "We don't see how we can defend segregation in Church and fight it on the street car. If the Church sanctions the pattern of segregation it complicates the whole pattern of secular life. The Church is supposed to furnish moral leadership. It is either all or none."

The Rev. Clark Cummings of St. Louis told the delegates: "When we inquire of the hotels whether or not they could accommodate an interracial meeting they answer: 'Why does the church ask us to do something that the church itself will not do?' "

First Hand Account of Racial Terrorism in Tennessee

A Former Army Chaplain Goes to Columbia And Presents Results of an Investigation

By Joseph G. Moore
Lecturer at Seabury-Western Seminary

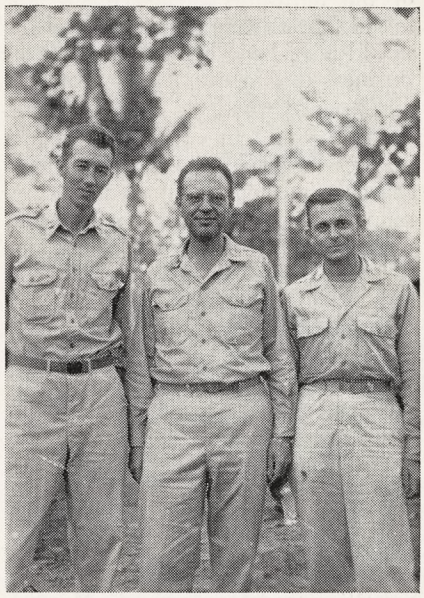
Columbia, Tenn.:—Early Tuesday morning, Feb. 26th, hell broke loose here. In a period of a few hours the entire Negro business section of the city was smashed and shot up, every Negro's home invaded and searched, and sixty-eight Negroes jailed, five Negroes shot, many beaten up and the whole Negro population frenzied with fear lest any further violence ensue.

This was not mob violence in the usual sense, for in this period, no Negroes were killed, the whole Mink-Slide area (Negro) was being protected by the Tennessee state guard, and the search and devastation on the community being accomplished by the state police, under its chief, Lynn Bomar.

Chief Bomar says they were searching for the men who may have shot the four policemen of Columbia earlier in the evening. Governor James McCord spoke of searching for the leaders of the Negro insurrection. Sheriff W. W. Underwood was confused by the whole sequence of events in the light of eight years of sheriff and deputy sheriff, and a good record of being fair to Negroes. The county's books show that during his period, fewer Negroes than whites have been arrested, in proportion to the population. Why, said he, should the section of the population which had throughout these years been more law abiding suddenly become lawless?

What happened leading up to the search incident was this: On Monday morning, Feb. 25th, a white radio repair mechanic named Flemming hit a Negro woman named Mrs. Gladys Stephenson in an argument that arose when she called for her radio. Her ex-serviceman son, James C. Stephenson, who accompanied her, went to her aid, and in the struggle that ensued Flemming was knocked through the front window. When the struggle was over, the Stephensons were in the city jail, and Flemming was having his bruises dressed.

Shortly after noon, according to Sheriff W. W. Underwood, the Stephensons were changed from the city jail to the county jail to make it safer for them. There was a crowd of white men congregating in the city square about a block and a half from the Negro business district, or Mink-Slide area. The sheriff went to the city square and talked to some of the men, then was told that a similar group was forming in the Mink-Slide area, went there and found this to be true. Here he talked with the Negroes, noticed that many were armed, and dispersed the crowd. "I told them to go home and take their guns with them, that there would be no trouble," said Sheriff Underwood.



Apparently still concerned at supper time, the sheriff told Mr. Sol Blair, one of the Negro businessmen to give bond for the Stephensons, and Mr. Blair says, "Get them out of town." This Mr. Blair did.

As dusk came on, Sheriff Underwood was again called to go to the Mink-Slide area because of a congregation of Negroes there. He went, and again found them armed and worried. They mentioned that some white man had bought a rope, but he told them to go home, that he would take care of them. He talked especially to a minister, Cal Lockridge, who had a gun, told him to go home, and Mr. Lockridge left while the sheriff was there.

Evening found the community still in great fear, for every light in the Negro area was turned off. The sheriff again conferred with the chief of police of Columbia. The Negroes say a car drove down the main street, and as it passed the Negro business district fired a volley of shots. Sheriff Underwood says he heard three shots in the Negro area. From the square, four policemen left and went into the Mink-Slide area on foot, supposedly to search for the people firing, and were shot at, and hit, by buck shot. It being completely dark identification was impossible.

From the sheriff's testimony, he must have been at the county jail at this time, locking up two drunken white men, since when questioned by Mr. Ira Lattimore, executive secretary of the Chicago Civil Liberties Committee, and Mr. Sam Neuberger, lawyer for the National Federation for Constitutional Liberties, and myself, he said they were the ones he had spoken to earlier in the afternoon at the public square and warned that they would get into trouble if they continued to drink.

Barely a half hour from the time the police were shot, the state police were on the scene, under the direction of Chief Lynn Bomar, who drove from Nashville, he said, a distance of 46 miles, in 32 minutes. They waited until enough state police could come before going into the area but began immediately to set guard around the entire Negro area. Almost at the same time, the state guard came into Columbia and set up their lines on the outside of the state police.

Center is the Rev. Joseph G. Moore, now lecturer on pastoral theology at Seabury-Western, photographed with two fellow officers in the South Pacific where he served throughout the war as a chaplain

This was explained in Gov. James McCord's office as a means to keep off any white gangs that might try to raid the Negro community.

Sometime after midnight, the searching party began a systematic search of the Mink-Slide business district. The method used was a defense-in-depth idea, with certain state troopers covering from the center of the street with tommy guns, and other troopers in close to the buildings themselves. Chief Bomar was in the inner group near the buildings. They took shop by shop, and covered half the business district before they found anyone. Their method of breaking in was exactly that, for all the window fronts had been smashed in, and the doors which were locked, were smashed in, tables and chairs overturned, and each place of business left in shambles.

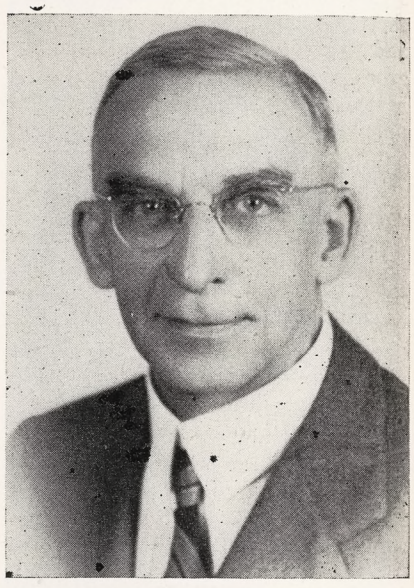
Midway in the area the bright light they were using to illuminate each building, found a Negro. He was in the Blair barber shop. When the light came on him, this Negro, identified according to Sheriff Underwood as "Papa" Lord Kennedy, raised a shot gun and fired through the window.

Chief Bomar said that this was the last time shooting occurred from the Negroes during the search. He said too that after this shot, they let the district have it, releasing tommy guns and small arms into all of the succeeding buildings. Bomar said they fired high, but on examination of the buildings themselves it was found that anyone higher then prone would have been hit. The rest of the business district was raked with gun fire and smashed up.

After completing the search of the business district, they continued to search the entire "Bottoms" community, a community composed of eight blocks at this point. They also searched the other Negro district in the city. Sixty-eight Negroes were arrested and taken to the county jail. All guns were confiscated, as well as ammunition, and a lid of strict security clamped down on the entire community.

On Tuesday afternoon when Mr. Maurice Weaver, attorney for the NAACP arrived, he was permitted to go to the jail and see two members of the community in jail, Mr. Sol Blair, and Mr. James E. Morton, both leading businessmen of the Negro community. He then went to see Mr. Julius Blair, father of Sol, and the leading businessman, age 75, to have him go bond for the other two men. This was done, and Mr. Julius Blair went with his attorney R. S. Hopkins of Columbia, and secured the release of Mr. Morton and Mr. Sol Blair.

A half hour after Mr. Julius Blair came back from the jail, a car drove by his house, and raked it with gun fire, according to his testimony. Two hours later the police came and arrested him on a charge of suspicion of implication in the insurrection of the night before. After Tuesday, Mr. Weaver reports he was refused permission to talk with any prisoners on the grounds that they had not secured him for counsel. District Attorney Paul Bumpus said at our conference that they were questioning each and every Negro, after which they would be released and could get their own attorneys. Mr. Weaver, at a conference with us in Nashville Sunday, March 3rd said he had not been permitted to see anyone else in the jail even at that time.



A group of forty-two Negroes were taken to Nashville on account of overcrowded conditions at the Maury County jail in Columbia, and returned to Columbia three days later on Saturday, March 2nd. The return being coincidental with a writ of habeas corpus obtained by Lawyer Weaver for their release from the jail in Nashville.

On Friday, March 1st. after questioning, 'Diger' James Johnson and William Gordon were told they could be released on bail, and while waiting in a room in the sheriff's office in the jail, were shot, and killed by four deputy sheriffs. Sheriff Underwood said two deputies were in the same room, one asleep, the other with his back turned to them, talking on the telephone. He further said that while they didn't know how the Negroes did it, one of them must have found a gun in an old hunting jacket left in the room. He was also confused by the question of ammunition, but felt that in spite of the thorough search, the Negro must have brought some ammunition in with him. The Negro must have filled the pistol, taken one shot at the deputy using the phone, who was wounded in the arm, then the four deputies came in blazing, and the two Negroes. Gordon and Johnson were killed! Sheriff Underwood said this was regretable!

By Sunday, March 3rd, an unidentifiable number of Negroes had been released on bond of $250. States Attorney Bumpus told us that most of them had been, and that all of them would be except those of confessed guilt. Attorneys Looby and Weaver, attorneys for the NAACP could not tell us, since they said it was still impossible for them to find out.

We met and talked with Messrs. Julius Blair and his three grown sons, and Mr. James E. Morton, who had been released and brought to Nashville by friends, and attended a meeting held to formulate plans for the adequate defense of the Negroes of Columbia. Their stories are ones of fear, ruthless use of police power, destruction of property and vicious treatment while being arrested. None of these men, leaders in the Negro community, one, Mr. Julius Blair, for fifty years, has ever been arrested. All own businesses in Columbia and have chaired Red Cross and War Bond drives in the community.

In our conference at the jail in Columbia, Messrs. Bumpus, Bomar and Underwood intimate that they suspected they were dealing with a case instigated by Negro leaders. In our conference with Governor McCord we were told that the state of Tennessee could handle its own affairs and that in the face of terrific odds, they felt that the state police

He has been president of the laymen's club of the diocese and has also served on the standing committee and as a trustee of the diocese. As a deputy to four General Conventions he has been a member of the Prayer Book commission and of the unity commission where he has worked earnestly for decisive, favorable action on union with the Presbyterian Church and state militia had saved the lives of many Negroes, and done a good job. They too intimated that this was a Negro insurrection stimulated by outside influences, mentioning Eleanor Roosevelt Clubs, Disappointment Clubs, the Southern Conference on Human Welfare and other "outside" influences.

On Sunday, before we returned to Nashville from Columbia, we were given a chance to talk to Negroes in the area by Chief Bomar. What we found there was abject fear, and an unwillingness to express themselves for fear of retaliation.

Up until Sunday, March 3rd, no white man had been arrested for his

Editor's Nightmare

"WOULD anyone write a nice spiritual editorial on the third Sunday in Lent?" Quite so—we begin forthwith. The enemies in the collect are doubtless spiritual. "Walk in love"—so the epistle begins; that is also spiritual. The earthly sins, to which it proceeds (and which annoy delicate ears), are simply a foil and contrast to the spiritual tone. But why must the apostle sully his epistle with that word "covetousness"? That strikes a jarring note in a spiritual editorial. And why, in condemning sex and inconvenient jesting, does he have to recur to this theme, and condemn the covetous man along with "the whoremonger"?* How beastly of him! May he be a communist or at least a fellow-traveller? He might even include profitable covetousness among "the unfruitful works of darkness," and urge not only no fellowship with profit-making, but even the reproving of it. My, my, this is not good for a spiritual editorial! Perhaps we had better leave this annoying choice of scripture alone. Could we trust ourselves to go on to the gospel, with all its talk about Satan alias Beelzebub? Covetousness might possibly be inferred to belong in that company, just as some wicked men have charged that American corporations have Nazi affiliates. No, no—this is all too unsettling; the last state of our editorial might be worse than the first. We had better start again, and write it around a nice spiritual hymn like "He walks with me, and he talks with me" . . .

Awake, thou that sleepest!
Christ shall give thee light.

*Prayer Book, p. 129.

Upon Waking

AS THE gospel for Lent's third Sunday shows, Jesus Christ had no namby-pamby ideas about good gradually overcoming evil by general enlightenment. For him there was relentless conflict with Satan; every encounter with an insane person was a battle with evil; every restoration to mental health was a victory over Satan. He cast out demons with the finger of God. God's right hand of majesty, which in the Collect we pray may be stretched forth, was raised in warfare against the devil's hosts. The Christian liberal who strays from this stern realism into salvation-by-education imperils the forcefulness of the gospel.

The battle with Satan shifts from field to field through the generations. Those bearing the sign of Christ must follow the main course of battle, and not be content to fight minor engagements in outlying sectors. Where in our generation is the central battle forming? It falls in a position greatly embarrassing to the present-day Church, which for the most part is respectable, and for several hundred years has sanctified property as a natural right.

The divine right of property, the alleged privilege of the rich to do as they will with their possessions, has been challenged from many directions. The churchmen, whose fathers and forefathers defended this theory with complete sincerity, are finding with confusion that it cannot be defended either by the New Testament or by the tradition of the Church. "In this tradition," says Archbishop Temple, "the rights of property, while perfectly legitimate, are always an accommodation to human sin, are subordinate to the general interest, and are a form of stewardship rather than of ultimate ownership."

For some years, the propertied classes of the capitalist democracies have realized that they shall no longer receive the aura of supernatural approval which they enjoyed for two centuries. Their reaction, far from being humble, has been mainly sulky. They are in danger of becoming the pawns of Satan; they are rebelliously defending what they have, and there is no intellectually respectable principle to justify them.

It appears that Christ's battle is shifting to the very bastion of Satan's kingdom: the age-old exploitation of the many by the few. This is embarrassing for us, for most professing Christians are in the more comfortable classes. The covetous man of this Sunday's epistle, who is there said to have no inheritance in the kingdom of Christ, will not much longer serve as a pillar of the Church. If the Church truly follows the tide of Christ's own battle, she may expect internal explosions and the consequent inrushing of fresh air—the spirit of the God who is no respecter of persons.

"QUOTES"

LENT is not a period when we go without certain things in order to indulge in them later. Rather it is a time for forming habits which may become a permanent part of our lives. Essentially it is time for discipline and discipline for men and nations is always a price of efficiency. The difference between all forms of totalitarianism and democracy is that in the former discipline is imposed while in the latter it is largely voluntary. If democracy is to survive it must learn discipline itself. Otherwise liberty may turn into license where every man does as he pleases, a condition which already exists to too great an extent in our country, in our schools, in our churches and homes. And, insofar as it does, it constitutes a grave weakness and serious danger.

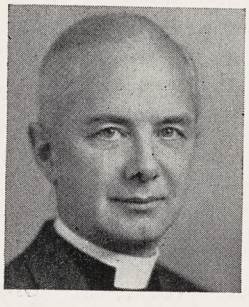
Vocational Giving

THE vocational giving of Frank Sibilia of St. Alban's Church, Albany, California, was featured on a program of the Mutual Broadcasting System recently. Sibilia, who owns the Mark Hopkins Hotel barber shop in San Francisco, has made a hobby of building a church with scissors and comb. He began by cutting the hair of members of his congregation in his spare time and putting the money in the building fund. Then he began cutting the hair of the clergy and placing their payments in the same fund. Many of his customers became interested in his project and added substantial sums as tips. So his vocational giving expanded until he has raised about $6,000 of the $10,000 total in the building fund. Last year, he turned in over $1400 by his own efforts.

Newspapers caught the story and Berkeley and Oakland papers ran pictures and feature stories of his work.

The story does not end with Sibilia, however, for many other members of the congregation have found ways of giving of their vocations as well—accountants, bankers, real estate operators, salesmen for cosmetics and clothes, and others. And now the boys in the church school are going to take up shoe shining for the building fund.



It is the lesson of stewardship and tithing over again, with a new interpretation. For now one's job becomes a vocation where one is called of God to serve the Church through his work.

Innocent Improvements

by John W. Suter

Dean of Washington Cathedral and Custodian of the Book of Common Prayer

THE Prayer Book will undergo its next revision whenever the Church, speaking through General Convention, so orders. The men, or men and women, who will do the preliminary work that is required before any actual changes can be presented for debate in the two Houses, will be whatever persons the duly constituted authorities elect and appoint. No member of the present Standing Liturgical Commission will necessarily be of that number. The Commission exists not to revise the Book, but to collate and preserve whatever suggestions are sent in between revisions.

Not as a member of this Commission, or in any other official capacity, but only as a priest of the Church, I submit the following observations.

The Episcopal Church stands squarely in the stream of catholic tradition; it is also a Church which played a willing and significant part in the Reformation. If any group ever presented to General Convention a proposal to adopt a new Prayer Book which obscured or slurred or belittled either of these two facts, such proposal would fail—and deservedly.

Our Church contains a great central majority, consisting of persons who gladly accept the two inheritances from the past, and who are eager to preserve and protect the rights and privileges of both. They want the ecclesiastical "Ship of State" to remain on an even keel; "rocking the boat" is what they will always resist. But in the Church there are also two other groups—one leaning far out to starboard, the other to port. Add them together and they are still less than the majority; but they present difficulties and cause dangers.

There are two types of change proposed for the Prayer Book. For convenience let us label them "controversial" and "innocent." By controversial I mean any change which would weight the boat either to starboard or to port. Such a change would move the centre-of-gravity, causing the Ship of State to ride the waves at a new angle. One would have to weigh each such proposal in the scale of ecclesiastical justice and make sure that the same number of pounds was added to each side of the boat. This is a painful process: nerves get on edge, each group eyes its opponents with suspicion.

By innocent I mean any change which has no effect one way or the other in the matter of ballast. Of these a great many have been proposed, and it is with these only that I am concerned in this article.

LEAVING the two Daily Offices untouched, we need to add a special form of service for Sunday morning which in its overall design will include a sermon and an offering. There are times when the members of a parish wish to assemble at a relatively late hour on Sunday morning for a non-Eucharistic service—a situation for which the Prayer Book makes no definite provision. The service might follow some such liturgical design as this:—Opening Sentences; Hymn; Exhortation; Confession and Absolution; Collect of the Day (one or two) and one or two others, making three in all; Versicles; Psalm; Lesson(s); Canticle(s); Sermon; Hymn; Creed; Versicles; Intercessions (ending with the Lord's Prayer and the Grace); Offering (announced, received during hymn or anthem, presented); General Thanksgiving (standing); Hymn; Blessing.

The section of Prayers (pages 35-46) needs further enrichment. We must make it clear to our people that the Church cares greatly about the things which happen between Sundays, and in a modern, industrialized nation.

The Collects on pages 49 and 50 should be distributed to their appropriate places.

The Penitential Office should be adjusted in the light of the best advice from those psychologists who are first of all Christians and Churchmen.

On page 69, the Summary of the Law does not sufficiently cover the subject of our Lord's teaching as to Law and Love. Some attention should be given to St. John 13.34.

Bible scholars can help the Church make better selections for certain of the Epistles and Gospels. In some cases where the selection is already good, there is need for revision in the translation. (cf. the Revised Standard Version.)

The Collects for the Days are of very unequal quality. Some are perfect, others are medium, a few are unworthy. Christian devotional literature abounds in excellent collects, and certain substitutions are indicated.

The Office of Holy Baptism needs considerable improvement in the matter of good English; it also needs a prayer for the Family.

Very few persons seem altogether satisfied with the Order of Confirmation, and for the most part the changes that have been proposed have nothing whatever to do with the struggle between a Catholic and a Protestant emphasis.

The Visitation of the Sick should be thought of not as a service, but as a manual of devotional materials for either an individual or a family group. Like the Penitential Office, this section can be improved by the aid of Christian psychology.

The Burial Office needs an Act of Commendation which can be used when the Committal is to form a separate service.

The Psalter in the Prayer Book is there for a special purpose—to present to the Congregation an opportunity for antiphonal reading on those occasions when the Psalms are not sung. Each Psalm should be so printed as to divide the material in accordance with the inner design of the poem itself. To do this would require some rearrangement, and the omission of the verse-numbers.

We should treat Family Prayer as a supplement, freeing it from the literary and rubrical restrictions which properly restrain the body of the Book. We could so present the material as to envisage a twentieth-century American Family (complete with children) assembling for a brief daily act of devotion led by a layman—possibly around the breakfast table. The prayers should deal with such actualities as school-going; play and recreation; industrial life and farm life; newspapers

EACH week during Lent we will present a number of questions based on articles featured in the series: Issues Before General Convention. Rectors or other discussion leaders we hope will find them helpful but we suggest that they add to them or make up their own questions. We add that authors are alone responsible for their contributions, the views expressed not necessarily being those of the editors.

DEAN SUTER'S ARTICLE

1. Do you agree that the Episcopal Church is both Catholic and Protestant?
2. What distinction does the author make between "controversial" and "innocent" in discussing possible revisions in the Prayer Book?
3. Is it your opinion that we need to add a special form of service for Sunday morning? Discuss his proposal.

MRS. PIERCE'S ARTICLE

1. What is your understanding of the present law of the Church governing marriage and the re-marriage of divorced persons?
2. Do you think the present law often works injustice and therefore is un-Christian?
3. What sort of instruction do you think young people should receive before marriage? Should they receive it from their rector, their parents, or both?
4. What do you consider adequate grounds for a divorce?
5. Discuss the proposal of a court as outlined by the writer. Would it effectively meet the problem?

and radios; wedding anniversaries; birth and death; health and sickness; happiness as well as sorrow; blessing a new home; seeing a son or daughter off for college; an engagement.

Some people question whether this is a good time to think about another revision. If the 1946 Convention authorized the beginning of a study looking toward revision; if some group appointed by the Convention produced a "trial book" by 1949 (the 400th Anniversary); if the Church studied this book from 1949 to 1952; if the Convention did its work from 1952 to 1961; then the new Book would appear thirty-three years after the latest previous revision. In other words, the two revisions would be just a generation apart; and in view of the rapidly changing social and international scene, this could hardly be called indecent haste. The editor of the Living Church asks, "Why lift up the anchor?" The answer is, "In order to move forward!"

On Holy Matrimony

by Katharine C. Pierce

Member of the Commission on Holy Matrimony

THE objective of the joint commission on Holy Matrimony has been stated by the chairman, Bishop Davis, as "A canon that is theologically sound, expressive of the mind of Christ, and workable with the least possible injustice and the greatest possible good for society." The present commission began its work with this goal before it knowing that if it is achieved the proposed canon will not be the most controversial matter to come before the Convention as someone has predicted but that it will be accepted on its merits though we were under no illusion that it would be an easy task. At our first meeting we reviewed the debate and confusion that took place at the 1943 Convention and studied carefully the canon that was proposed at that time, noting both its faults and its good points. We almost made out a schedule for future study and work.

The commission of which the present one is the successor was first appointed in 1925, and it seemed advisable to have a review prepared setting forth the proposals that had been made to successive General Conventions and the action, if any, that was taken on them. It is noteworthy that not until 1937 were the women of the Church consulted in any way. The Convention then asked the Woman's Auxiliary to appoint a committee to make a study and report to the General Convention commission before 1940. Three year later the Woman's Auxiliary asked that two women be added to the commission which was done and they are now serving.

The present commission asked the bishops in every diocese and missionary district to appoint a committee to study the whole subject of Holy Matrimony and advise the commission of their findings. Some fifty such committees were appointed but the results numerically have been disappointing, only fourteen dioceses, two missionary districts, two independent groups and one individual have been heard from, three dioceses submitting suggested canons. These reports, however, have been very helpful and have had careful consideration by the commission. Five pamphlets were prepared and sent to the members of the fifty diocesan committees for their information. The first was introductory and contained articles by Walter H. Stowe on The Debate on the Marriage Canon and A. B. Kinsolving II on Our Church and Christian Marriage. The others were New Testament on Marriage by Burton Scott Easton; Notes on the History of Marriage Legislation by Frederick A. Pottle; The Mind of Christ on Marriage by Frederick C. Grant, together with The Theological Aspect of Christian Marriage by W. Norman Pittinger and Jesus Teaching on Divorce by Sherman E. Johnson. The appropriation for expenses was not large enough to print sufficient copies of these important papers for all the delegates to the Convention but permission has been given to the Episcopal Evangelical Fellowship to have them reissued and it is hoped that they will be available in the near future.

In order to keep within the modest budget the whole commission will have come together only three times but there have been meetings of subcommittees made up of members who were not widely separated geographically, and a great deal of work has been done by correspondence. There has been an earnest effort to keep the subject before the Church for two reasons: in order that the commission might have the benefit of the thinking of as many groups and individuals as possible, and on the other hand that the Church might be informed about the work of the commission.

The change in the name of the commission is significant. Before 1940 its title was On Marriage and Divorce. Since that time it has been Holy Matrimony indicating a shift of emphasis to the constructive side.

THE findings of the Woman's Auxiliary committee reporting in 1940 are worthy of consideration. They were profoundly convinced that Christian Marriage is the life-long union of one man and one woman and that preparation for it is as important as preparation for confirmation. They asked that an Office of Instruction for Marriage be added to the Prayer Book. During the study the committee asked the theological seminaries how they prepared the students to give instruction for marriage. The answers showed that all the seminaries were concerned about it but that the methods varied greatly. The committee thought the time had come for a more coordinated policy. They also asked the bishops how their clergy went about instructing couples who came to them to be married. In many dioceses fine work is being done and practically all the bishops reported that the clergy were conscientiously following the canon. My own observation based on asking young people about their interview with the clergyman is that the instruction is sometimes very brief and superficial. While the canon cannot go into great detail about instruction it should stress its importance as it is obvious that proper and adequate preparation is fundamental to a happy and permanent Christian marriage.

The commission reaffirms the position stated in the 1943 report that "Christian marriage is not only a life-long union but a life-long spiritual union—a union not only of bodies but of personalities, a sacrament of which husband and wife are the ministers each to the other, and indissoluble . . . and this emphasis is the special duty of the Church. For while marriage might be called a "natural sacrament" rather than an ecclesistical one, it is a fact that the blessing of the Church confers something real and definite and valuable upon those who seek a spiritual union, and a participation in her fellowship is a principal source of grace and strength. The Church is therefore primarily concerned only with such marriages."

There is still the question of what the Church should do when marriages fail and homes are broken. In the first place there is no connection between the civil and canon laws. A divorce decree is the result of an action brought in a civil court—the canon is concerned with the marital status of its members in the eyes of the Church. The formation of the canon would be far less difficult if there were a uniform divorce law. When a marriage fails where facts are found to exist or to have existed as manifestly to make a spiritual union impossible the method of acting on each case is more consistent with Jesus teaching of mercy and forgiveness than a hard and fast legislative canon that takes no account of the particular difficulties involved. He was impatient with the legalists. The commission has been advised that personality changes do take place and that defects of character are by no means always "latent" and therefore the canon should take account of the possibility of such changes.

The commission agrees that the canon should provide that applications for remarriage after divorce should be made to the bishop. If he believes that the persons intend to make a Christian marriage he should then refer the matter to a group of advisors (or court) for their opinion on the law and facts. It is my great hope that in selecting the members of the court the bishops will recognize the fact that the woman makes one half of the marriage and that they include a woman among the lay members, and there are women lawyers in the Episcopal Church. After receiving the opinion of the court the bishop will then render judgment to the applicant.

In addition to the diocesan courts there should be a permanent commission on Holy Matrimony appointed by the Presiding Bishop which should be consulted in cases where the opinions of the diocesan court are divided and to which reports should be made regularly. The opinions of the commission and the reports of the courts will quickly build up precedents that will guide and help the bishops and the courts in making their decisions.

It has been said that such a canon would impose too much work on the bishops but there is nothing more important in our society than Christian homes and Christian families. It seems to the commission that dealing with the matter of remarriage after divorce in this way would be the best way to avoid injustice and would work for the greatest good. Proper preparation would either prevent marriages where the persons have not the proper sense of responsibility about creating a Christian home or would greatly increase the sense of responsibility of those who do. In either case the failure of marriages would be decreased.

In the twenty one years since the commission was first appointed there has been a great deal of study given to the whole subject of Holy Matrimony. It is evident that the members of our Church, clergy and laity, are not satisfied with the canon as it stands now. Is it too much to hope that the forthcoming Convention will take constructive action and approve a canon that is in accord with what modern scholars believe is the mind of Christ on marriage and divorce, and also with his concern for the sacredness of the individual person?

New Books

Excellent Good *Fair

_The Trinity and Christian Devotion_ by Charles Lowry. Harpers. $1.50.

One Sunday morning some years ago, I sat in St. Paul's Cathedral, London, and heard a Canon preach on the subject Justification by Faith. For a while I listened intently, grateful that I had a theological education. Then my thoughts wandered among the pews. I saw all sorts and conditions of men. Some of them were roughly attired, and lunch pails gave evidence of their next stop. They were saints of the afternoon shift. Some were obviously prosperous folk from the better parts of London; other were clerks and agents, keepers of books and shops.

The lengthy sermon had ended, and I was inclined to believe that the Canon's efforts were neither justified nor faith-provoking. I could hardly forget the lunch pails, the problems that haunt even the better parts of London, and the puzzled expressions on the faces of those keepers of books and shops. Someone had missed the bus and I was quite certain it wasn't the congregation. Not far from the pulpit was Holman Hunt's masterpiece, "The Light of the World." It was simply a quiet suggestion of what those people in the pews needed and had not received.

I have just finished reading another Presiding Bishop's book. This last one, The Trinity and Christian Devotion, is a magnificent work written by Dr. Charles Lowry, a distinguished scholar in the Episcopal Church. It was a refreshing, invigorating experience to study the history and practice of the Christian faith through the mind and spirit of Dr. Lowry. But again I must add, I was extremely grateful that I had a theological education to back me up.

When I closed this book my thoughts turned back upon the lunch pails, the prosperous folk, the keepers of books and shops; only this time they were not the ones in St. Paul's Cathedral, London, but those in St. Paul's Church, Concord. This was their book as well as mine. I had promised to review it for them in Lent. I wanted many of them to use it during their devotional reading hours of the season. But I was bothered by the prospects. True, I could comb its theological hair and trot it out into polite, parish life. It could be used as a background for an interpretation of the doctrine of the Trinity. But that would put the parishioners on the receiving end of the Lenten production line and they should be able to "read, mark, learn and inwardly digest" for themselves. And they can if we make righteousness readable!

Possibly I have the common idea shared by most clergy, in believing that the members of my parish are the most intelligent and spiritually-alert churchmen in the country. Even so I could not in fairness to them ask that they read The Trinity and Christian Devotion and report their findings back to me. It would be too much to ask. Frankly, it just isn't up their alley.

None of this criticism is levelled at Dr. Lowry. He has written an excellent book for the clergy and Church scholars. Rather this criticism is concerned with the policy behind the Presiding Bishop's book. For whom is it written? For the pulpit or the pew? Is it not for both? But tradition can play strange tricks with truth. Once the policy of a scholarly treatise is established for the Lenten book it will be difficult to break away from it. Bishop Dun and the Rev. Theodore Ferris have given us outstanding books. They both made righteousness readable. For the most part however the diet of the Presiding Bishop's book has been too rich for congregational consumption.

Since this book is published only once a year it should be one of our greatest evangelistic investments. This Lenten book is read by leaders and members of many denominations and it could be made a mighty force for the Christian life of this land. Billy Sunday once told a group of Episcopal theologs, "Here is my first rule in homiletics: Never preach to the intellectual giraffes in your congregation. And the second is like unto it: always leave some cookies on the bottom shelf." Whether or not we agree with the Sunday style of preaching, most of us will admit that his rules are worth considering in the written and oral message of the Church.

Hesitantly I submit this suggestion for the policy behind the Presiding Bishop's Lenten book: a council be appointed by the Presiding Bishop to assist him in selecting both the writer and subject of the book. Undoubtedly he would welcome the assistance of six or seven clergymen and laymen who represent vital and varied ministries and occupations. Let them survey the field together and decide on the author and his subject in the interests of both the pew and pulpit. This is only a suggestion and it may be an impractical one, but at least it may invite other suggestions that are better. We must not forget the lunch pail, the prosperous folk, and the keepers of books and shops when we write our annual Lenten message. And let us hold this thought to be grandly true: once righteousness has been made readable it will become livable.

Spanish Catechism Criticized By Buffalo Clergymen

A Jesuit Priest Replies that Insidious Intolerance Is Cloaked Under Liberalism

Edited by Sara Dill

Buffalo, N. Y.:—Bishop John C. Ward, retired bishop of Erie, the Rev. G. Napier Smith, rector of Grace Church, and the Rev. William T. Heath, rector of Trinity Church, were among the eight local clergymen to issue a statement asking the Roman Catholic Church to clarify its attitude toward a new catechism reported being widely used in the state schools of Spain. The catechism is said to denounce liberalism for defending liberty of conscience, worship and freedom of the press. The statement follows:

"We have read with concern the recent news dispatches describing the newest catechism of the Roman Catholic Church in Spain. In this catechism, liberalism is attacked because it is said to teach 'that a state is independent of the Church,' and because it defends 'liberty of conscience, liberty of worship, and a free press.' It was reported that freedom of press, conscience, worship, assembly and instruction are described as 'pernicious,' and liberalism is categorized as a 'sin.' It was stated that among the principal errors most damaging to Catholic souls, Nazism is not listed, although one does find the following: rationalism, Protestantism . . . modernism and Free Masonry.

"Can we assume that the Roman Catholic Church teaches the same principles throughout the world? Does the Roman Catholic Church in America, then, support these teachings? If it does not, what is its attitude toward the Spanish Church which promotes them?

"If the Roman Catholic Church in America does support these teachings, how does it reconcile its position with regard to such basic American ideals as the separation of Church and state, liberty of conscience, liberty of worship and a free press? How can the Roman Catholic Church teach such a catechism and at the same time support American democratic ideals?

"We believe that the vast majority of Roman Catholics in America wholeheartedly support American democracy. We, therefore, feel that it is of great importance to all Americans, Roman Catholic and Protestant alike, that an official of the Roman Catholic Church immediately clarify the Church's position regarding this new Spanish catechism."

A reply was made a few days later by the assistant pastor of a local Roman Church, the Rev. John J. Scanlon, in which he contended that the writer of the letter has a "misconception" of the word "liberalism." He declared that in the religious field liberalism has led to rationalism, naturalism, modernism and that it "denies to the Church the right of bettering social conditions and of pronouncing on questions of social justice or international law." He also stated that Spanish Catholics regard "freedom of the press in a special sense" because "just as the liberals cloaked an insidious intolerance under the fair name of liberalism, so they have time after time given lip service to the freedoms and denied every one of them."

Forum on Race

Beckley, W. Va.:—Interracial relations were discussed here on March 3rd in an open forum under the auspices of the local ministers association, directed by the Rev. Andrew Jones, rector of the Episcopal Church.

Presented in a manner similar to that of the town hall of the air radio program, the forum opened with brief discussions by four speakers. James H. Rowland, Negro, local attorney, spoke on "Interracial Relations in Religion and Culture"; Dr. Frederick Richmond, of the staff of the Raleigh General hospital, on "Provision for the Health of the Minority Race in the Beckley area"; C. G. Peregoy, chairman of the Beckley recreation committee and principal of the Woodrow Wilson high school, on "Recreational Needs"; and William Reid, Negro, principal of the Byrd Prillerman school of Amigo, on "Points of Contact Between the Races in the Field of Education."

Immediately following the formal discussions the speakers were subjected to questions from the audience for an open discussion.

That race relations are not only responsible for certain undesirable conditions in Beckley but are also a direct cause of the plight of the world today, was the view advanced by Rowland in a plea for more personal contacts between the races. He scored the necessity for Harlems, Chinatowns and Little Italies in a nation made up of a conglomeration of races from its very inception. Learn to love your fellowman, he urged, not because his skin is the same color as yours or the texture of his hair the same; and judge your fellow man by his conduct alone.

The churches and schools, "pillars of the community," are not doing enough, William Reid said, in covering the problem from the educational view.

"Churches are too concerned with getting members to heaven and not enough with helping them get along better on earth," Reid complained. "What good would it do if I should get to the heavenly land and find the fellow next to me was my former neighbor on earth who wouldn't speak to me."

We need to teach both the white and the colored children what is right, and correct wrong impressions created by adults, Reid said.

During the discussion period, a Negro teacher questioned the exclusion of colored women from the "Day of Prayer" meetings held by local churches every Thursday.

One woman, a nurse, declared that without a Negro hospital no openings were available for newly-trained Negro doctors and nurses.

Outlaw Conscription

Philadelphia: — An appeal to President Truman urging that the United States join with other members of the UNO in outlawing military conscription has been sent to Washington by 150 leaders of religion, education, labor, and agriculture. The statement declared that conscription is no protection for national security and "is based on obsolete notions of warfare and has little relevance to the atomic age." Under conscription, the appeal stated, there would be established "an undemocratic system aimed at unquestioning obedience to military authority" which would "constitute a totalitarian threat to religion, education, labor, and business."

Asserting that the only hope of security is "total peace," the statement said Americans must not "throw away our nation's chances for world moral leadership." Comparing conscription to the "disastrous pattern of European militarism" the petition charged its adoption would lead to the regimentation of youth, exposing them "to the dangers of barracks life at a most crucial and impressionable period in their lives." "We call upon all people of goodwill to oppose every move toward the new isolationism which says that we shall arm to the teeth against all others," the statement said.

Among the large number of Church leaders signing the appeal was Bishop Edward L. Parsons, retired bishop of California.

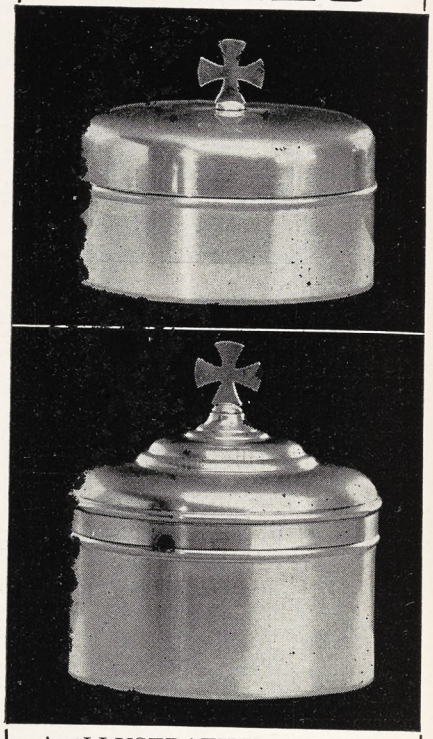
Native Bishop

London (wireless to RNS):—The Rev. Nirode Kumar Biswas, native clergyman of Katni, Nagpur, India, has been appointed Anglican Bishop of Assam, it was reported here. The bishop-elect, whose father also was a minister, began his career as a medical doctor and left a lucrative practice to enter the ministry.

Attack Churches

Cairo (wireless to RNS):—Attacks on the English Cathedral and St. Joseph's Church (Roman Catholic) during the recent Cairo riots have been denounced by leading Moslems in Egypt as contrary to Islamic teachings. "Intolerance is a sign of weakness, narrow-mindedness, and disregard for Islamic teachings," Mohamed Saleh Bey former vice-rector of the Egyptian University, declared in an article in the Cairo daily Al Ahram shortly after the disturbances.

The English Cathedral, one of Cairo's most beautiful churches, was stoned and looted by a mob during the anti-British demonstrations of February 22. Another mob set fire to a service men's club in the basement of St. Joseph's Church. Damage to recreational facilities of both churches was so extensive as to curtail their social activities for some time to come.



Progressive Action

Atlantic City, N. J. (RNS):—Support of the "valiant women in Argentina struggling for the re-establishment of constitutional government in their country," was pledged by the Young Women's Christian Association at its national convention here. The resolution specifically expressed moral support of the YWCA of Buenos Aires.

Another resolution urged continued strengthening of relations between the United States and the Soviet Union.

Both resolutions were contained in a public affairs program adopted by the convention which called for the United States to play a major role in the UNO, abolition of peacetime compulsory military training, such control of atomic power as will insure its use for peaceful purposes only, and the placing of U. S. overseas bases under UNO trusteeship.

Domestically, the program urged policies which will increase foreign trade and raise standards of living. It asked continued collective bargaining rights, extension of social security benefits, and upheld the right of women to work according to their abilities with equal pay for equal work.

Churchmen Protest

Boston: — A statement in the Massachusetts House of Representatives by Republican Representative John R. Taylor of Quincy, in which he referred to education in racial understanding as a scheme to "whitewash the nigger" has resulted in widespread protests by clergymen from all parts of the state. Several hundred churchmen made known their objections at a meeting held last week. Later a petition, signed by more than 2,000 persons, was presented to Gov. Maurice Tobin by the Rev. Kenneth DeP. Hughes, rector of St. Bartholomew's, Cambridge, urging the governor "to correct this outrage."

Mr. Taylor apologized to the legislative body later, insisting that he is free of racial and religious prejudices and declaring that the phrase he used was not intended as a slur on Negroes.

Social Workers

Boston: — Miriam Van Waters, superintendent of the woman's reformatory in Framingham, Mass., led a discussion on March 13 at the first of a series of four meetings being held in Lent at Trinity Church, under the auspices of the diocesan social service department. The general theme is "Our Religion at Work" and deals with faith, fellowship, worship, the ministry. The Rev. Gardiner Shattuck of the staff of Trinity Church conducted a short service, which was followed by supper and the discussion.

Romanists Defend Spain

Madrid: — Declaring that "Spain enjoys an enviable peace in contrast with nations which suffered and still suffer from the ravages of the world war," Cardinal Segura y Saenz of Seville has issued a call to Spanish Roman Catholics to defend their country against "dangers which surround us." He charges that propaganda against Spain is being spread by "that political party which would destroy order and all organized society."

School is Full

Berkeley, Calif.: — The third quarter opens at the Church Divinity School of the Pacific on March 25 with five new students entering which will fill the dormitory space for single men. Dean Shires has announced that the capacity for next year will be forty men, with dormitory space for twenty-six single men and apartments near the school for married veterans.

Brotherhood in Mobile

Mobile, Ala.:—Brotherhood Week was observed in reverse when All Saints' Church was visited by vandals, along with the Roman Catholic Cathedral, and a Jewish Synagogue. The tenor of notes left would indicate the job was done by members of a holiness sect which felt these religious institutions were not teaching the right doctrines! The loss of altar linen, clergy vestments, and some communion silver was reported at All Saints', with adequate insurance coverage.

Record Enrollment

New York:—There are 457 students at Union Seminary—a record. Of these 200 are graduate students who are being directed in their work by a committee headed by Professor Frederick C. Grant, WITNESS editor.

President Accused

Shanghai:—The Christian Church in occupied China was a center of resistance to the Japanese, according to Richard T. Baker, correspondent for Religious News Service. The only direct instance of collaboration which has broken this record was the somewhat doubtful case of William Sung, president of St. John's University. Accused by his students and alumni of "going out of his way to appease the Japanese," Sung resigned and the university is now in the hands of an acting president. Friends of Sung declare he was never pro-Japanese nor anti-Chinese and should be given credit for the fact that the institution continued and Japanese never invaded the campus.

Today, the Church in Shanghai is operating almost as it was before the war. Newspapers of the city are full of church announcements. Services are held regularly with congregations which pack the buildings to the doors.

A Serious Word About Your Inherited Religion

A momentous question is looming in the spiritual foreground of today:—How does it come that the God of the Bible, who was preached by the great Hebrew prophets as the divine champion of social and economic justice, has been largely obscured behind the outlines of a conventional Deity who is hostile merely to individual "sin"? Part of the answer follows:

The Hebrew prophets began their evolutionary campaign for social and economic justice in the northern kingdom of Israel. When the northern tribes were lost, the only remaining tribe was Judah, or the Jews; and upon this tiny fragment of the Hebrew nation was thrown the entire cultural burden and mission of Israel.

The Hebrew Bible, as it now stands, was produced for us by the devoted labor of Jewish compilers and scribes, who, in and after the Babylonian exile, toiled over ancient Hebrew documents, and added an enormous mass of Priestly material which largely enters into the first five books of Scripture.

But the practical effect of the Priestly material through many centuries has been to dim out the non-Judaic "lost tribes" as factors in Hebrew history, and to obscure the origin and significance of Hebrew prophecy; while, at the same time, the tribe of Judah is put forward as the chief custodian of a revelation delivered, once for all, upon a mountain top, and coming from beyond the orbit of secular human experience. The mountain has overshadowed the social and economic gospel of the prophets for more than two thousand years.

This problem cannot be avoided. It calls for the careful attention of scholars and the sanctified common sense of the laity. Organized religion, both Jewish and Christian, must learn to find God in the slow evolution of secular history.

has always been fair to either race. It was inferred in our conference with Messrs. Bomar, Bumpus and Underwood that it was practically impossible to get a Negro to testify against a white man. So, one hundred Negroes arrested, against two whites!

The state of Tennessee does not want outside interference with its own problems! The state of Tennessee has problems with its youth from this war, as revealed in this Columbia difficulty. At our conferences it was revealed that most of the prisoners were young men. The Negro youth of Tennessee have returned from fighting for their country, and have heard of the Four Freedoms, have in the struggle been given new hope, new thoughts of opportunity. Now, the state of Tennessee must put the colored youth in their place; must put out the light of equal opportunity to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. From sergeant, chief, they must again become, 'boys,' 'Niggers.' That must be retaught to them if old patterns are to be resumed, and the state of Tennessee wants no interference at this time.

Can we disregard the voices of these young people and be silent, or can we let them hear our voices, North, South, East and West? Wire States Attorney General Paul Bumpus, Columbia Tennessee, and Gov. James McCord, Nashville Tennessee, today. We demand the release and complete vindication of the Negroes of Columbia and ask for the arrest and prosecution of the white instigators and perpetrators of this crime and violence! Send money to Mr. James Dombrowski Southern Conference of Human Welfare, 212½ Union St., Nashville, Tenn., marked Columbia Action Fund. We must let our voices be heard in Tennessee, or in any other part of America which tries to shut out the high light of freedom from the eyes of Americans! Americans, regardless of race, creed, color or sex, must be freed!

REV. JAMES A. MITCHELL
Rector of St. Paul's, Englewood, N. J.

Your editorial in the issue of March 7th, entitled "Protestants Also Have Converts," leads me to send you a personal bit of corroborative evidence on your thesis that the movement of converts between Rome and other Christian Churches is not on a one-way street, as one might suspect from the publicity given by Rome to its conspicuous converts. In my ministry I have never failed to have at least one Roman Catholic in my adult confirmation class, and some years two or three. This means that at least 30 or 40 Romanists have come over to the Episcopal Church in my parishes alone. And they came not as a result of proselyting, but of their own free will,—because of the un-American and un-Christian attitudes of Rome toward mixed marriages, or because they could no longer stomach certain priestly practices which seemed to them unethical, or teachings which they found intolerable to an educated 20th Century mind.

On the other hand during the same period I could count on the fingers of one hand those who have "gone to Rome." Multiply these figures by the thousands of Episcopal clergy who must have had a similar experience and you get quite an exodus from Rome to Anglicanism in the past twenty years. Yet we are but one Church among the scores of denominations in America. No wonder Rome has to publicize its conversions!

To any who may be surprised at this, I recommend a subscription to The Converted Catholic Magazine, 229 West 48th Street, New York City, in which they will find many facts—social, political and moral, which will not only surprise but shock them. Is it commonly known for example, that there are two and a fourth times as many broken homes in mixed marriages as in marriages in which the parents were both Protestants? To clergy who face the mixed marriage problem (and who does not?) may I also commend a booklet issued by the Federal Council of Churches (297 Fourth Ave., New York City), entitled "If I marry a Roman Catholic," which can be bought for 5 cents. It contains information which every Protestant or Episcopalian contemplating such a marriage should have.

REV. FREDERICK B. MULLER
Rector of St. James', Fremont, Nebr.

I am sure that Henry Pitney Van Dusen displayed the "temperament and conviction" of a Presbyterian very well in his recent WITNESS article. He pursues the old and ragged theme "You started it" with regard to negotiations on unity. Perhaps we shall never know in what cloakrooms the Concordat was hatched, but it is safe to say that when the General Convention made the proposal in 1937 it did not take all Presbyterians by complete surprise.

The bland assumption that he feels concerning the willingness for such unity on the part of members of the Presbyterian Church of the U.S.A. is misleading. By implication he portrays Presbyterians as hungering and thirsting after unity with other Christians. He says it is a life commitment with them.

Now, may I ask Dr. Van Dusen his own question. What are the facts? Among the myriad Presbyterian churches that dot our country, what organic unity has been achieved among them? We still have Presbyterians of the U. S.; U.S.A., Cumberland, Orthodox, Covenant, United, and a host of others. They say they are working their problem out—let's have a report on the progress.

It ill behooves a divided and broken Christian group such as the Presbyterians to shove us around and call us names because nine years have elapsed since we made a hasty and ill advised overture toward them.

It would seem that the proper way to bring about a real unity among Christian peoples lies in the ability of groups with common traditions to gather together. The Lutherans are doing much in that direction, quietly and earnestly. The Methodists have done wonders. So far, the Baptists and Presbyterians are merely talking to one another, if that.

Instead of giving the Episcopal Church credit for being held together by the Prayer Book and the Episcopate (the first he seems to admire much), Van Dusen chides us for it. For shame that a man of his capacity and professed interest in Christian unity should belittle things that hold Christians together. Why doesn't he spend some time analyzing fragmentary Presbyterianism and try to mend its fissures before sneering at and attacking the Church in which he claims to have his foot.

I believe that the General Convention meeting in Philadelphia will deal realistically with the unity question and bide its time until many other communions have, at least, a speaking acquaintance with their brethren who are but a notch or two removed from them in doctrine, discipline and worship. And what is more, Christian unity is a world concern, not a peculiar national problem. The World Council of Churches may be able to lead the way in this matter; I hope they will. However, I am convinced that the Presbyterian Church of the U.S.A. will never succeed in intimidating our Church by snide remarks such as 'put up or shut up' and 'you started it.' They have been bumbling around maintaining a monstrous pretence of interest in Christian unity, while they themselves have been exploded into more sects and conventicles than almost any other recognized communion.

This is to inquire if the entire series of official navy photos of the action in the Pacific appearing on the covers of THE WITNESS will be available. I think I have never seen anything quite so breath-taking as these pictures and it is my desire to own a set.

ANSWER: Others have made similar inquiries. If there are enough wishing for a set of the ten photographs we will be glad to print them as a pamphlet. May we hear, please?

Rev. Francis B. Sayre Launches A New Project in Ohio

Returning After Four Years in the Pacific
He Becomes Industrial Chaplain for Diocese

By William Dinwoodie

Cleveland:—A new venture in religion—the appointment of a chaplain to work with the men in industrial plants—has been launched by the diocese of Ohio. Originator of the project and named to head it is a former naval chaplain, Lieutenant Commander Francis B. Sayre, Jr., a veteran of four years' service in the Pacific. Bishop Beverley D. Tucker has given the plans his formal approval.

Sitting in the quiet of Cathedral House, close to the heart of Cleveland's business district, Commander Sayre told how the idea of industrial chaplains came to him.

"There were 1,200 of us aboard the Cruiser San Francisco," he began. "I was the only chaplain. Naturally, I came to know many of the men, Protestant, Catholic and Jew, intimately. They came to me with their problems, family and personal, and I was shocked by the large number who had never before had any contact with religion.

"I realized then that the Church —organized religion as we know it —was losing some of its effectiveness because it wasn't going out after the men who never attend formal services. That raised the question of how we could best meet these men on a common level.

"After a great deal of thought, I came to the conclusion that it would be wise to place ministers in the larger industrial plants. If the minister had an office in the plant, it was likely the workers would come to him as they came to their chaplains on ship board or in army camps. Now here's what I have in mind."

Chaplain Sayre leaned forward in his chair. His voice was low and earnest.

"The diocese has agreed to support the experiment for a year," he said. "After that, I feel certain we can broaden it out on an inter-denominational basis with labor and management sharing in the cost. This may seem like a radical innovation but it's more like an extension of our chaplaincy service to hospitals, jails and other institutions. Now tell me what you think of it?"

The men sitting with Chaplain Sayre were impressed. They liked the plan. They also liked the quiet enthusiasm of the clean cut young chaplain who had promised to see it through. But where, they asked, would he get the clergymen to carry on the work if it were extended to plants in all sections of the city?

"I'd like to use as many ex-service chaplains as possible," Chaplain Sayre replied. "They've had experience with all types of men in the army and navy. I'm certain they'd have the best results with the workers in the plants."

Asked if he had selected the industry in which he would start the experiment, the chaplain shook his head slowly.

"I'd like to make a survey of the city first," he said. "Then I'll pick out the plant where I think I can be of the greatest possible service and go to it. I've no doubt we'll have plenty of cooperation when the project becomes known."

The chaplain was right. Within a week after newspapers announced the plan, the Greater Cleveland Ministerial Association had endorsed it. Labor and management also were quick to come to its support. Typical of the reaction of industrialists was the comment of Curtis Lee Smith, secretary, treasurer and general manager of the National Copper & Smelting Co.

"I think the plan of having chaplains in industry has some very good aspects," he said. "In my opinion, the person who goes into the plant as chaplain should work, as the chaplains worked in the army, on a non-sectarian basis. If he does, he should be able to do a great deal of good as a counselor—helping the men to settle their problems objectively."

Labor's position was summed up by Sam Sponseller, regional director of the CIO and personal representative of Philip Murray, when he said: "This experiment with industrial chaplains is certainly worthy of a trial and it deserves the support of everyone concerned. I'll follow its operation with a great deal of interest."

Chaplain Sayre is the son of a former high commissioner to the Philippines and grandson of Woodrow Wilson. He comes to his new assignment after a long and distinguished career in the navy. His heavy cruiser, the San Francisco, went through some of the heaviest fighting in the Pacific, carrying battle scars from Guadalcanal to Japan. During the latter stages of the war, the chaplain was on the staff of the commander of the Philippine's sea frontier in Manila.

duties in his home diocese, Massachusetts. Instead, he chose to center his work among the laboring men in the industrial city of Cleveland.

Those who have watched him lay the ground work for his new ministry to the workers have been deeply impressed by his sincerity and his ability to thrust aside minor obstacles. As one, they say: "He'll do."

The picture on the cover shows Chaplain Sayre, while still in the service, administering the sacrament to servicemen. This particular service, attended by four hundred men and officers just before going into battle, was conducted by two Methodist and one Presbyterian chaplains in addition to Mr. Sayre.

DEMOCRACY IN RELIGION IS URGED

Atlantic City, N. J. (RNS):—"Organizations of religion must not only preach democracy but must reveal democracy in themselves," Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam, president of the Federal Council of Churches, told 2,000 delegates attending the international convention of the Young Men's Christian Association here. The Methodist churchman declared that ecclesiastical organizations based on autocracy are not designed to give effect to democracy.

"Authoritarianism is repugnant to democratic men whether it be heard in the voice of a fascist dictator or be seen in the pageantry of ecclesiasticism," Bishop Oxnam said.

"Free men demand the right to make up their minds in the realm of religion as well as politics. The property interests of a church must never be put before the personal interests of a people. Power must be democratically controlled because it corrupts a religious institution just as it corrupts a political institution."

Bishop Oxnam called upon religious organizations to find effective means in bringing about world peace, stating that religious forces have been more effective in proclaiming the ideals essential to world order than in discovering the means to give effect to the ideals.

CLERGYMEN ACT ON STRIKE

Claremont, N. H.:—The clergy of this industrial town sent the Rev. William P. Neal, rector of Trinity Church and president of the ministerial association, to Washington to see if he could persuade government officials to take a hand in a strike which has been going on here for two months. The move followed a meeting of the clergy with officials of the Sullivan division of the Joy Manufacturing Co., who presented their views of the strike and said that they were unchanged.

During his visit to Washington which was financed entirely by the local clergy, Mr. Neal said he had talked with the "highest" men in most of the agencies he visited which included the department of commerce, the OPA, the NLRB and CIO headquarters. Most officials told him they were frankly impressed by the united action of the Claremont clergy and promised immediate action in the dispute, including the sending of a government conciliator who will attempt to settle the strike.

Inasmuch as the Claremont clergymen are an "impartial group," they are unable, Mr. Neal said, to make a public statement of their findings as a result of meetings with company and union officials but he reiterated that the clergy will continue its efforts to bring the strike "to a just conclusion." To this end, clergymen pledged all Claremont churches to a week of prayer beseeching "a just conclusion" to the strike.

ASKS EXTENSION OF SOCIAL SECURITY

Washington:—The Rev. John G. Martin, superintendent of the Hospital of St. Barnabas, Newark, N. J., urged the inclusion of employees of hospitals in the social security act in an address before the ways and means committee of the House of Representatives on March 12. "We want our old people to have at least the same consideration for their declining years as is given to other workers," Dr. Martin said. "We feel that their service on behalf of afflicted men, women and children should not be penalized as it is now through being debarred from participation in the advantages of the old age and survivors insurance feature of the social security act."

He also quotes a resolution of the American Hospital Association approving the removal of the exemption of non-profit hospitals from the provisions of the act.

LAKEWOOD CHURCH CONSECRATED

Lakewood, O.:—St. Peter's Church here was consecrated on March 10th by Bishop Beverley D. Tucker. Assisting in the service were the Rev. Louis M. Brereton, rector; the Rev. J. Philip Brereton, father of the rector; the Rev. D. LaBaron Goodwin, rector emeritus. At the same service 47 persons were presented for confirmation.

EXECUTIVE SECRETARY DIES

Wilmington, N. C.:—The Rev. Walter R. Noe, executive secretary of the diocese of East Carolina, died at his home here on March 11. He was 62 years old. He became archdeacon of the diocese in 1916 and executive secretary three years later.

Church in China Centralizes Work for Whole Area

Carries Out the Recommendations Made By Bishop Tsu On Visit to United States

By Richard T. Baker

Shanghai (RNS): — The House of Bishops of the Church in China held its first full meeting since 1941 with fourteen of the Church's eighteen bishops present. Chief action was the establishment of a central office in Nanking to coordinate the work of the entire Church. Bishop Y. Y. Tsu, assistant bishop of Hongkong, who during the war directed the work of the Church in Kunming, was made general secretary of the new central office. Bishop Tsu, on his visit to the United States two years ago, urged the coordination of the work before the National Council and other official Church groups and received general approval of his ideas, which has previously been approved by the bishops in China.

Major functions of the office will be to deal with Church matters on a national scale, administer central funds, gather total information on the reconstruction needs of the communion throughout China, promote Church-wide work in literature and publications, religious student work, lay training and the recruiting of priests. The office will also serve as an interim administration of the Church between the biennial meetings of its synod.

Anglicans in China have operated their Church on three partially autonomous lines. One was the Chinese Church itself. One was the missionary affiliation to the Protestant Episcopal Church in America. The other was the missionary affiliation to the Church of England.

While the bishops are cautious about predicting any immediate change in these three separate affiliations, the establishment of a China office is seen as a step toward eventual combination of all Anglican interests in China and a unified, autonomous control of the Church here.

Previously the American Church had contributed funds to certain dioceses in China, the English Church to others. It is hoped that eventually the missionary societies abroad will make contributions to the Church in China as a whole, which body will appropriate the gifts where they are most needed, without reference to previous diocesan affiliations.

A major change in the theological training program of Chinese Anglicans was made by the House of Bishops. The former Central Theological School of Nanking, which has been closed since 1941, its buildings looted, its library lost and its faculty dispersed, will not be reopened. A total reorganization of the school will take place, and it will be given a fresh start in connection with the theological department of St. John's University, Shanghai.

Bishop T. K. Shen, of Shensi province, has been named dean of the new theological school. It will probably open classes in September of this year. The bishops laid great emphasis upon high-grade, post-graduate theological training.

This emphasis was extended to include women workers in the Church. In 1941 funds had been received and the organization nearly completed for the Bawn School for Woman Evangelists. Then war came, and the school was never organized. The House of Bishops appointed a board of control for the Bawn School and empowered it to name a dean, to locate the school and organize a curriculum for training woman evangelists in church work, social work and community service. The school, it is hoped, will start classes in 1947.

The bishops voted to re-establish the now defunct Chinese Churchman, periodicals of the denomination, and to appeal to American and English friends for funds to re-equip parishes with prayerbooks and hymnals. Some dioceses in China have lost all their prayerbooks.

Since the last meeting of the House of Bishops in 1941, it was reported that six bishops have died and three have been consecrated. During the war years the only bishops' meetings held were those among prelates in Free China.

Churchmen present for the March meeting here included: Presiding Bishop T. Arnold Scott, Peking; Bishop John Curtis, Chekiang; Bishop A. A. Gilman, Hankow; Bishop P. Lindel Tsen, Kaifeng, Honan; Missionary Bishop T. K. Shen, Shensi; Bishop William P. Roberts, Shanghai; Bishop Ronald O. Hall, Hongkong; Assistant Bishop Y. Y. Tsu, Kunming; Bishop Lloyd R. Craighill, Anking; Assistant Bishop Robin Chen, Anking; Bishop Michael Chang, Foochow; Assistant Bishop Addison Hsu, Kweilin; Bishop Percy Houghon, whose episcopal duties are as head of the China Inland Mission; and Bishop C. T. Song, of eastern Szechwan.

The new central office will function provisionally until its charter is ratified by the first post-war meeting of the synod, probably in the summer of 1947. Funds for the establishment of the central office were given to the Chinese Church by the American Church.

CZECH CHURCH PROTESTS

Geneva (wireless to RNS):—The Czechoslovak Church, largest Protestant body in Czechoslovakia, has sent a message to the provisional committee of the World Council of Churches protesting against a resolution adopted at its recent meeting here regarding compulsory transfer of Germans from Allied occupation zones. In its message, the Czech Church, which is not a member of the World Council, charged the provisional committee with protecting Germans "who provoked their present plight by their own limitless arrogance." The committee, it added, "did not find words of Christian sympathy for the suffering innocent of Slavonic nations under German domination."

The message asserted that former citizens of German nationality "committed the worst crimes against the Czechs and Slovaks" and warned their continued presence in Czechoslovakia would "lead to open hostility and the destruction of international peace."

The Czech Church declared it will refuse to participate in inter-church aid from Western Churches "until the ecumenical headquarters takes into consideration the historical necessity of self-preservation, and the conditions of human existence for a Slav nation endangered twice in a century by Pan-German imperialism."

CHURCH IN CHICAGO FACES HOUSING

Chicago: — The most pressing problem in this city, as elsewhere, was faced at a diocesan conference held at St. Paul's on March 24. Dean Wilber G. Katz of the University of Chicago law school was the moderator of a panel discussion which included such experts as Elizabeth Wood, secretary of the local housing authority; Willard Townsend, CIO labor leader; William E. Hill of the American council on race relations; Earl B. Dickerson of the National Urban League. Bishop Conkling preached at a service held before the meeting, sponsored by the diocesan department of social relations.

AUXILIARY MEETS IN BOSTON

Boston: — Mrs. Arthur M. Sherman and Miss Avis Harvey of the national office of the Auxiliary were the headliners at a meeting of officers of parish organizations, held here at the cathedral on March 20.

FORBID MEMBERSHIP IN UNION

The Hague (wireless to RNS):— The Roman Catholic hierarchy of Holland has issued a pastoral letter forbidding Catholics to become members of the new Unity Trade Union movement because it is a "Communist organization." The letter was read in all Catholic churches throughout the country. The bishops also declared that the ban on Catholic membership in the N.V.V. (Dutch Trade Union Congress) and other Socialist organizations would be continued until the facts "show that the aims and principles of such organizations are no longer in opposition to Christian beliefs and the Christian spirit."

"It has become apparent," the pastoral letter declared, "that the Unity Trade Union is working under the guise of national unity in ways indisputably Communist. The clear-thinking part of the community has rejected it, and there can no longer be any doubt that Catholics may not be members of this Unity movement.

"What we stipulated earlier about membership in Communist organizations now applies to membership in this trade union movement. Any Catholics who are members of this movement must be refused the holy sacrament."

STATE LOTTERY OPPOSED

Springfield, Mass.: — Proponents of a state lottery to raise funds for the old-age assistance program in Massachusetts got a blast from Bishop Lawrence of Western Massachusetts, following a vote by the local council of churches opposing the measure. "True Christian standards, as well as the state statutes, condemn all lotteries," said Bishop Lawrence. "It may be done painlessly but the operation of extracting money is performed on those who can least afford it." A large number of civic and social organizations support the Bishop's stand.

INTERRACIAL SERVICE IN DETROIT

Detroit:—A colorful service was held at St. Paul's Cathedral here on March 10, under the direction of the diocesan social service department. It was both interracial and international, with the choir and clergy representing seven nationalities. Clergy to take part represented the Armenian Church, the Greek Church, the Roumanian Church, the Russian Church, the Syrian Church, the Serbian Church, the Episcopal Church. Also taking part were the Rev. Shigeo Tanabe, chaplain of local Japanese-Americans, and the Rev. Malcom G. Dade, representing Negroes. The sermon was by Bishop Edward E. Demby, retired suffragan bishop of Arkansas. The cathedral was filled for the service which was followed by an international and interracial tea in the cathedral house.

How Many Loaves?

THE gospel for the Fourth Sunday in Lent is the familiar story of the feeding of the five thousand. It is Jesus' answer to the problem of providing bread for the hungry. It teaches us two things about the nature of the world in which we live,—that what is to be must come of what has been, and that nothing is ever to be wasted. Five barley loaves and two small fishes, offered to God, will somehow grow into an abundance to feed a multitude, perhaps by shaming those who have provisions hoarded and hidden for themselves to bring them forth to share with their neighbors. And when the hunger of all is satisfied, still there is more remaining than was thought to exist at dinner time. Gather the fragments into baskets that nothing be lost. Another meal-time would find them already prepared.

Now it is another day, and another hungry multitude is wondering where it may find bread to eat. Only this time they haven't just gone without breakfast. They have been denied sufficient nourishment for years. The scourge of war has destroyed both home and harvest and they look in vain for enough food to give them the strength to rebuild their homes and plant again their ravaged fields.

But there are those in the world, members of that greater company who count themselves followers of the master of men, who do have food. As Christians, it cannot be their choice to say, "we will not share lest there be not enough for us and you as well." What there is must be freely offered and shared in the name and for the love of Christ, and it will be more than enough. We must start with what is immediately available, and it must be made available. In the Christian economy there is no place for the black-market, or hoarding or self-indulgent extravagance. In the shadow of the cross none may linger long who are content to give only a little and that too late. Sentence has already been pronounced upon them, "Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, my brethren, ye did it not unto me. Cast the unprofitable servant into outer darkness."

"QUOTES"

THERE is no cure for the evil of the world but a true knowledge of God. To know God is to live; to know God is to possess, or rather be possessed by, the creative power of that Love which is able to triumph over evil by bringing forth from it a greater good. . . . In the fellowship of an increased knowledge of God is to be found the only real hope for the rebuilding of society upon a surer foundation than that which, in our own time, has crumbled away. In such a sure-founded fellowship lies the only prospect of a true and enduring peace.

Knowing God not as a mere name but as a reality and living presence, we gain an infinite new hope as we learn to face, in ever deepening fellowship, the problems of the world.

What Will It Prove?

THE most gigantic bit of horseplay in the history of the world is being openly planned by presumably responsible people while the rest of us look on like a group of gawking schoolboys. Awe, fright and wonder have stopped us from doing anything but watch this tragic comedy.

If a group of the larger boys in our neighborhoods found a stick of dynamite and decided to blow up a garage just to see what would happen, and also thought it fun to lock some dogs and cats inside the garage to see what would happen to them, we would quickly decide that some other method of encouraging experimentation would be more useful. But as Hitler used to say about lies, the bigger they are the easier to get them across, so it is with this sort of foolishness. The larger it is the less the opposition will be.

On May fifteenth the army and navy are planning to drop atomic bombs on an atoll in the Pacific. To add to the excitement the atoll will be occupied by four thousand sheep, goats and pigs. Then the army and navy will solemnly report to the world on the destructiveness of the bomb.

Nothing could be devised that would go further to serve notice on the world that we are the most powerful military power on earth and that other peoples had best listen when we speak. Nothing could be devised that would further encourage research and experiment with atom bombs by other nations. Nothing would more clearly demonstrate that while we pay lip service to UNO we put our trust in our army and navy.

In other words, if this bomb explodes in the manner and under the auspices now planned it will explode the idea that the war was won for a peaceful community of nations and for all the peoples of the earth. We will be right back where we started.

There are some questions that demand answers.

Copyright 2020. Archives of the Episcopal Church / DFMS. Permission required for reuse and publication.

Two bombs were dropped; two cities destroyed. How many more bombs do we now have? How fast are we now making them? What do we intend to do with them?

All citizens and particularly Church people should demand that this experiment be a UNO project. We should demand that it be supervised by a selected group of scientists and engineers representing all peoples as well as our army and navy. We should inquire as to whether this type of experiment is the best way to discover how atomic power can be made useful to all mankind.

President Truman announced on March 22 that the test would be postponed for six weeks in order that members of Congress might witness the experiment. As we have indicated, there are far sounder reasons for forsaking the plan entirely and we earnestly hope the President will so order.

Hitler Tactics

IT WAS encouraging to read recently that the Polish army, 100,000 strong in Italy and 46,000 strong in Britain is to be disbanded. We hope to read soon that the Royal Yugoslav Army, organized by our army of occupation has likewise been disbanded. The existence of these two units was reported recently by Raymond Daniel in the New York Times, with this comment, "The United States army is pursuing a policy in Germany that is arousing suspicion in Russia, Poland, and Yugoslavia, fostering the German's hope of a future rift between Russia and her western Allies and defeating our effort to induce displaced people to go home. It is the practice of recruiting, equipping, and arming disaffected Poles and Yugoslavs for labor service companies and guards to replace the all too hastily redeployed American troops."

Such antics, if one can so refer to acts which might eventually involve us in war, make one wonder if it may not be the ghost of Hitler which is manipulating our foreign policy. The fact that our army has been pursuing such a policy, the strange "loss" in the files of the Soviet request for a loan of a billion dollars, and the approval by our state department of the sale of planes to Spain and Argentina explain a good part of Russia's distrust of us and follow Hitler's plan to divide and alienate the Allies.

Germany lost the war, but if this phase of Hitler's plan carries through and our country becomes embroiled with the Soviet Union, Germany may yet win the peace. The decision of Britain to disband the Polish army is a step in the right direction. It now remains for us to disband all disaffected groups and to remove such obstacles as stand in the way of building a solid basis for confidence and cooperation with the Soviet Union. The pathway to peace will not be easy, but it will be immensely improved if these Hitler inspired tactics can be eliminated in favor of a forthright and trustworthy policy.

A Strategy for the Church

by Herbert W. Prince

Rector of the Holy Spirit, Lake Forest, Ill.

A NEW strategy has become imperative for the Christian Church because a new psychology now possesses the people of the earth. The new psychology is partly due to the fact that the geography of yesterday is gone forever. The vision of Jesus, which was spiritual and not geographical, nevertheless embraced the kingdoms of the earth as the scope of his mission to mankind. The vision of St. John in the Apocalypse carried the vision of Jesus to fulfilment in prospect: "The Kingdoms of the world are become the Kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign."

Never in all the long subsequent history of Christianity have the spiritual vision and geographical man become counterpart; never until now. Now for the first time in history it becomes possible to contemplate and utilize the whole world as a unit of operations.

The United Nations Organization is in actual practice working on this basis. Nation talks with nation as man to man. The judgment of the majority overrules or sustains the proposal of one. The kingdoms of the world have in fact become the kingdom of man. They are thereby made ready through the sublime and profound workings of the spirit of God to become the kingdom of our Lord Christ.

It is the solemn yet exhilarating conviction of present-day Christians that nothing short of the Lord Christ's challenge has been issued to his Church to make the world his, now and forever.

Is the Church as we know it ready for the brilliant day which opens before it? Is the Church enthralled by the vision of Christ and his apostle? Manifestly and disappointingly not. Without wasting words on laments shall we not face the new situations which confront us all in our post-war world and square ourselves to plan to meet them as though we were responsible directly to our Lord, standing before us and charging all of us as Christians to fulfil his renewed command? The new psychology which possesses the peoples of the earth is as near home to us as the nearest Negro neighbor and it stretches out continuously to the farthest Chinaman, Filipino and East Indian.

There is no need to enlarge on the reason for this. Everyone knows it. Like ferment the races of men at home and abroad are rising from the bottom to the surface, through the heat applied by the terrific pressures of war. Where the despondent masses are in themselves inert they are inflamed by leaders whose restless energy and new ambition will no longer let them alone. The whole of humanity is rising to the levels where we ourselves stand. They rise to equality with us. We ourselves being Christians cannot deny this equality, for in the language we habitually use in Bible, Prayer Book and Hymnal all are one in the Fellowship of Christ Jesus.

Can we devise the strategy for today and tomorrow which will satisfy the rising peoples of the earth, satisfy our awakened consciences, satisfy the terms we acknowledge, satisfy our Lord and Master?

The Episcopal Church is not approaching this for the first time. A commission comprised of twenty bishops and other clergy, laymen and women was appointed at the General Convention of 1937 and reported to the General Convention of 1940. The subjects studied under strategy and policy were missionary scope and areas, promotion and stimulation, approach to racial groups, education, social welfare. The commission was continued at the 1940 Convention and reported again in 1943 on the same subjects. In the elapsed three years very little pertinent material was added to the first report, perhaps because of the uncertainties in men's minds produced by the vast cloud of war which limited vision and confined scope of action.

Both reports are good though mild; they confuse strategy with tactics. They also suffer from the fate of reports to large formal bodies such as the General Convention. Though admirably prepared, carefully worked out, the result of much labor and frequent meetings, they are, nevertheless, period reports, finding repository in the archives instead of firing the minds of the constituency. The committee is discharged at its own request and the living flame created dies down to embers and goes out.

This article concerns itself with strategy alone, not tactics. Strategy is large-scale planning, like the grand strategy devised by the master military and political minds of World War II. It included every branch of human endeavor—labor, industry, finance, services, personnel, home front, home forces and allied forces. It assembled every conceivable aid to bear upon the task to be done. Tactics was the job of the generals and others on the field of battle, the method of applying the strategy.

NOW that the war is over is the Church, and in particular our Episcopal Church, in a position to plan its entire work on a grand scale having in view the total resources of the total Church? Few if any desire to contemplate the alternative, which is to jog along in a relatively small way, doing our work as we have always done it, not overconscious of the presence and progress of other large branches of the Christian community.

We cannot, we should not, desire to continue working alone. In the providence of God our Episcopal Church in America lives its life in the environment of Protestant Churches. We would if we could live our life equally in the environment of Roman Catholic Churches, but that hierachy will have nothing to do with us and the priests so instruct their people. Our religious relations with them are on the surface. Until the time comes when the Roman Catholic Church recognizes the equality of all Churches professing full allegiance to Jesus Christ as Lord, our association in America in religious thought and action is almost solely with the great churches of Protestantism. It is sheer obtuseness to pretend otherwise. (Our contacts with Eastern Orthodox are interesting but not practical.)

Unity between any two or more of us is a process that must come from within and must take its time. It is a process we cannot wait for. Beyond union with Presbyterians other unions must come. Meanwhile the world will not and cannot wait for organic union. Coordination of program and work is within our reach if it is within our will, and the strategy contemplated by this article revolves around this coordination. Undoubtedly close coordination of ministry, services and work is a major factor in promoting and hastening actual union.

The lines along which coordinated strategy would naturally work are:

1. The parish as the home base where Christian character is developed.

2. The colleges where the parish product is tested and where men are secured for the vocation of the ministry.

Copyright 2020. Archives of the Episcopal Church / DFMS. Permission required for reuse and publication.

3. The theological schools where Christian character is trained for life-service.

4. The diocese and missionary district as a corporate unit (the bishop the leader), combining the membership of parishes in social and civic activity, church extension, relations with other communions, relations with the national Church.

5. The National Council (executive committee of General Convention) as board of strategy acting as agent for the Episcopal Church.)

Put this planning alongside the present jumbled situation in our own Church and the need of large scale strategy becomes clearer:

We have parish independence but no cohesive relation to the diocese and its institutions.

We have eleven theological colleges, but no system of support, expansion or merging.

We have diocesan independence, but no integration through the House of Bishops.

We have race relations Sunday, but no plan of race relations.

We have a National Council, but no national consciousness.

We have domestic and overseas missionary districts, but no well-devised plan for expansion, contraction or cooperation.

The plea is that a new world of communications, of access, of human relations, of new political, social and religious aspiration has burst upon our view, demanding at least re-study of our responsibilities and objectives as a national Church in relation with the responsibilities and objectives of other denominations of the Christian fellowship.

In this series, Bishop Keeler of Minnesota is presenting the domestic missionary strategy which includes Negroes and other minorities. There is plenty of material in the numbered statements above for half a dozen articles outlining an integrated strategy, all based on the principle laid down, that the life of the Episcopal Church is in the environment of the Protestant churches and that a true Christian strategy calls for coordinated action everywhere and united action in areas abroad where the war has provided the opportunity of a new start.

The particular purpose of this article is to indicate the lines of strategy for the world mission of the Church. The man who has drawn it for all the churches of America is Dr. Walter W. Van Kirk in his new book A Christian Global Strategy. As executive secretary of the department of international justice and goodwill of the Federal Council of Churches, he knows what is happening all over the world, he has the understanding and vision to plan a thorough-going strategy and he has the courage to challenge the churches of America to unitedly undertake the task of re-Christianizing the peoples of the earth. This article draws upon his book for thoughts and facts.

The area where a new strategy is most pressing because of the immediate plans of many American churches for reconstruction and advance is in the Far East where most of the former work of missionary societies was destroyed by or during the war. What is to be our planning in one single area of the world where one-half of the population of the world lives—a billion people in India, China, Japan and Southeast Asia?

WE CAN no longer justify a strategy of Episcopalianism or Anglicanism. The time has arrived for a long-range determination to establish in these and other lands a central council for pooling administration, resources and personnel according to the need and at the request of native Christian membership and leaders. At the present time the Christian enterprise in China is promoted by 64 North American denominations, to say nothing of British and European Church groups. Can we as Christians first, and Episcopalians second, willingly tolerate the continuance of such denominational Christianity? Is this our Lord's Christianity or our own? It would be far better for all to withdraw, leaving a single trustworthy representative of each American, British, and continental Church to stay on the ground and work out with an equal number of Chinese representatives of the Churches a type of Christian Church and worship most fitting the Chinese character and concept. To this end we should bend our efforts and if need be take the lead.

That would be long-range planning for Christianity in China. The same process is claimed for Japan, the Philippines, India and every other country or field where the war has forced upon us all a re-consideration of our work and where the people are rising out of the dust to assume the responsibilities of nationhood. Think of India, where we have joined the host of religious groups working for the spiritual uplift of the people. There are 42 British Churches (or societies of churches), 17 continental and 54 North American Churches engaged in this uplifting struggle! All together they are scarcely noticeable in the vast brown mass of Indian humanity. A well-chosen council of the whole lot, planning with Indian Christian leaders a united Christian organization would have a fair chance of making some headway. It would be an ecumenical approach to an ecumenical situation.

These are recommendations for a new strategy in one great field of Christian witness and service —the overseas field. This is not individual radicalism. The responses made in the correspondence columns of THE WITNESS to the writer's article in the issue of January 10 clearly indicate a widespread endorsement of the principle of coordinated planning.

as suffragan of Newark is completely alert to the same thing. "The present urgent need is for a cooperative society, an organization of united nations and a United Church." It is imperative that our Church be alerted. Fortunately we have the Church press for this very purpose, keeping in the front living issues which get buried in Convention reports.

The 1943 report to General Convention already alluded to makes some headway over the report of 1940 in affirming that our long-range policy overseas "should have for its aim the establishment of indigenous, autonomous and self-supporting Churches." And with a true understanding of method the committee recommends our work should be carried out in cooperation "with the other branches of the Anglican Communion and in consultation with the International Missionary Council and the Foreign Missions Conference," which is the operational arm for North America of the I.M.C.

This is an encouraging start, promoted by an official commission of the Episcopal Church, which laid down a sound principle of planning in these words: "The work to be done everywhere is great and the need for it pressing. Christian statesmanship calls for cooperation with other Communions to the fullest possible extent without surrender of the trust that is ours, in order that the problems to be solved and the difficulties to be met in every community and area may be understood and shared."

This led to the following Resolution: "That where it is possible we cooperate with other Communions in the furtherance of our common Christian responsibility."

Here we have a sound principle to work on, recommended by an authoritative commission of our own Church. What this writer and article call for imperatively is the implementation of these words by action now. We have the urgent pressure of the times and we have the vision of leading American statesmen-Christians like Dr. Van Kirk, associated with similar strategists of The World Council of Churches. These men are not denominationalists. They are Christians first, last and all the time, with a true vision of ecumenical Christianity and a passion for the one Kingdom of Christ.

The Christian global strategy was first devised at the Edinburgh Conference in 1910. Springing out of it came the International Missionary Council which right now can be the medium of a coordinated strategy for all non-Roman churches. It has already promoted the Jerusalem Conference of 1928 and the Madras Conference of 1938.

Emerging from these world conferences, important Christian groups have made headway in comprehensive lines of united advance. The Cleveland Conference in 1945 called for "A united missionary movement." The Toronto Conference the same year worked out new strategy in these fields: Christian medical council for overseas, rural missions cooperating committee, world literacy and Christian literature committee, committee on cooperation in Japan, All-India Christian medical college at Vellore.

These are hopeful signs of the Churches of America working together. They point the way in the present crisis and opportunity. There is no further warrant for a partitioning of the Christian community. Precedent and pride must give way to the creation of a world board of Christian strategy which will represent all racial and national Christian groups. Out of this will emerge unity because it proves the will to unity.

The imagination is fired by such a vision, but it is neither impossible nor impractical. Such world strategy has been planned and carried out for the purposes of global war. Will any alert Christian admit it cannot be planned under the guidance of the supreme spirit by Christian-statesmen-strategists? And is not love for Christ a more enduring purpose than the determination of military victory?

The world is one. Christians the world over are committed to the doctrine of the equality of all men in Christ. The task will never be done in division. The time has arrived to accomplish it in the unity of the spirit and in the bond of peace.

FOR LENTEN DISCUSSION

EACH week during Lent we will present a number of questions based on articles featured in the series: Issues Before General Convention. Rectors or other discussion leaders we hope will find them helpful but we suggest that they add to them or make up their own questions. We add that authors are alone responsible for their contributions, the views expressed not necessarily being those of the editors.

ARTICLE BY DR. PRINCE

1. Do you think the Church is ready for the opportunities of the "one world" presented by the writer in his opening paragraphs?
2. Do you agree that in planning the whole work of the Church, at home and abroad, that the Episcopal Church should cooperate fully with other Protestant Churches? Why not with the Roman Catholic Church also?
3. Discuss the lines along which coordinated strategy should be worked out.
4. Do you think there should be a central council, representing all the Protestant Churches, for pooling administration, resources and personnel?
5. How do you think missionary work should be carried on in China, Japan, India, Africa and other mission fields?
6. Do you believe that a world board of Christian strategy, representing all racial and national Christian groups will lead to Church unity?

Governments are conscious now that general peace and the coordinated-unity of nations can only be maintained by the voluntary relinquishment of some sovereignty on the part of each. That is the process which confronts the Churches and is the price that must be paid for Christian victory. The Episcopal Church among others must pay it to be truly and fully Christian.

The Living Liturgy

By MASSEY H. SHEPHERD, JR.
Professor at Episcopal Theological School

"Unity and Godly Love"

"THE evils which we bring with us to the Prayer-Book are charged upon it. I believe that it is the great witness against them. Some of us would use it as an excuse for self-glorification, for boasting of our superiority to foreign nations, or to the sects at home. . . . If we used it faithfully, I believe we should find it the most effectual deliverance from that spirit which converts our nationality into an instrument of dividing the nation, our privilege of belonging to a Catholic Church, into a plea for exclusiveness. . . . I am sure the Liturgy will torment us so long as we continue selfish and divided, therefore I would cling to it. I am sure it may be the instrument of raising us out of our selfishness and divisions; therefore I value it above all artificial schemes of reconciliation, all philosophical theories, all inventions, however skilful, for the reconstruction of human society in which there evidently lies no such power."

These are the words of a prophet. Frederick Denison Maurice wrote them almost a hundred years ago in the preface of a volume of sermons on the Prayer Book. One cannot but wonder, however, how many of us are even now sufficiently tormented in spirit by the prayers of our Liturgy which we say day after day to take ever so short a step in obedience to God's will towards the visible unity of Christendom. How long will God forbear with us who talk and defer action, who pray for unity and do little or nothing to further it? We would consider it a mockery of God for the Church to pray for missions, yet never put a missionary in the field. It would be scandalous for us to pray for those who are in "trouble, sorrow, need, sickness, or any other adversity," but do nothing to "comfort and succour" them. But our prayers for unity seem to begin and end in lip service.

Every day that we say Morning and Evening Prayer we pray that "all who profess and call themselves Christians may be led into the way of truth, and hold the faith in unity of spirit, in the bond of peace, and in righteousness of life." Every time the Holy Communion is celebrated we pray that the Universal Church be inspired "with the spirit of truth, unity, and concord . . . and live in unity and godly love." At every service of ordination a petition that the "Church may be one" is offered; every man ordained a priest solemnly promises before the altar of God to "maintain and set forwards" as much as he is able "quietness, peace, and love, among all Christian people"; every minister instituted as rector of a parish concludes the service of institution by praying with his new congregation for the unity of the Church. The third collect at the solemnities of Good Friday looks forward to "one flock under one shepherd." The Bidding Prayer opens with the theme of unity, and the collect for Tuesday in Whitsun Week incisively states the purpose of unity—that the Church "may manifest thy power among all peoples, to the glory of thy Name."

Three occasional prayers for unity in the Prayer Book are constantly used in our worship. The beautiful medieval collect at the head of page 49, based on our Lord's farewell to His apostles (John 14:27), occurs also in the Roman Missal in relation to the Kiss of Peace. It is particularly apt for use with one's assistants and servers after the celebration of the Holy Communion. Archbishop Laud's prayer for the Church (page 37) is justly famed and popular. But why, oh why, did our 1928 revisers tamper with his glorious phrasing: "where it is divided and rent asunder, make up the breaches of it, O Thou Holy One of Israel"? The sonorous cento of New Testament phrases in the prayer for Unity which immediately follows Laud's prayer (cf. Eph. 4:4-6, Acts 4:32, Rom. 15:6) has an interesting history. I do not know who wrote it; but it made its debut in 1714 at the Accession Service of George I, when the reference to "our unhappy divisions" doubtless had more of an eye to the political schemes and intrigues of the Pretender and the Jesuits than to the schisms of the Dissenters. The prayer came into our American Prayer Book in the 1892 revision—due, I am sure, to the vision of William Reed Huntington. Dr. Huntington, by the way, was the real father of the Quadrilateral which the whole Anglican communion has adopted as its platform for unity. God grant that the mantle of his genius fall upon a new leader who will deliver us from the hypocrisy of our prayers—and quickly, while there is yet time!

Control of Bomb Is Essential To Avoid Destruction

Prof. Kirtley Mather of Harvard Declares That Ten Nations Can Prevent a Disaster

Edited by Sara Dill

Atlantic City, N. J.: — Kirtley F. Mather, Harvard geologist, whose article on the atom bomb appeared in THE WITNESS for February 14, told the convention of the YMCA meeting here that a swift, practical barrier against the possibility of atomic warfare can be erected by ten nations, including the Big Five. The noted scientist said his proposal was based upon the collaboration of those countries in which sources of fissionable materials are located.

"If such control of source materials is established and if an appropriate commission has the specific authority to inspect all operation pertaining to nuclear research and the use of those materials within all nations, no group of men anywhere on earth could manufacture atomic weapons in secret," he said.

"The directives are clear: immediate international control of the weapons of mass destruction; long-range objective of increasing the dynamic of good will and the sharing of intellectual resources of the world."

Bishop Enthroned

London (wireless to RNS): — Bishop C. S. Woodward was enthroned as Bishop of Gloucester by Archdeacon Alexander Sargent of Canterbury, acting for the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Steps Toward Union

Philadelphia (RNS): — Proposals for reunion of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. and the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. (Southern) have gained support among the former body, it was reported at a meeting of the department of Church cooperation and union here. Representatives of the department announced that the plan providing for reunion of the two Churches, which was distributed for study and report throughout the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A., has been favorably received, with few comments against it. Drafting committees from both Churches will meet jointly at Asheville, N. C., June 18-20, to further union negotiations.

The department also reaffirmed the intention of Presbyterians to promote the ultimate union of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. with the Episcopal Church. One hundred and fifty-eight presbyteries have planned to set up committees on Church cooperation and union, and 32 already have done so.

Seeks Fund

Oakland, Calif.: — St. Paul's Church here is seeking $75,000 to commemorate its 75th anniversary. Of this $16,000 will be for the R. & A. Fund and the rest for tower chimes, an honor roll of the war dead, furnishings and equipment for the church and parish house, the building of a chapel. The Rev. Calvin Barkow is the rector.

Say It Ain't So

New York: — The announcement from Moscow last week that the Ruthenian (Eastern Rite) Church has severed its centuries-old union with the Vatican and had returned to union with the Russian Orthodox Church was received by Romanists in this city "with frankly-expressed skepticism" according to Religious News Service. The Ruthenian Church has about seven million members in three Ukranian dioceses. There are also two bishoprics in Czechoslovakia, two in the United States and one each in Hungary, Rumania and Canada. The basis of Roman Catholic skepticism was not made clear in the reports beyond the usual charges of persecutions and efforts on the part of the Soviet government "to stamp out Roman Catholicism in Ruthenia."

Getting Together

Blacksburg, Va.:—It's an interesting congregation, this one at Blacksburg. Naturally most of the families are connected in one way or another with the Virginia Polytechnic Institute or its extension division. The senior warden, Mr. W. D. Saunders, is the retired dairy and cheese specialist. The junior warden, Mr. J. A. Waller, Jr., is an agricultural engineer.

The Baptists and the Presbyterians here had a Sunday School attendance contest not long ago; the losers to entertain the winners with a supper. Well, the Presbyterians won. Or maybe it was the Baptists. Anyway they had the supper—and—they picked on Mr. Waller as the speaker. He chose Church symbolism as his subject and illustrated his talk with pictures. So there they were; an Episcopal junior warden discussing Church symbolism in the Masonic Temple for an audience of Presbyterians and Baptists and using slides from a Methodist concern. And Mr. Waller says, "What's the matter with Church unity and the UNO?"

And the rector, the Rev. Frank Van Dusen Fortune, tells some interesting things of his Canterbury Club, made up chiefly of co-ed students of the V.P.I. One of them is a fine young Jew who, along with the others, is contributing through weekly envelopes to the Episcopal Church, attends the meetings regularly and reads the evening prayer service when his turn comes. In answer to a question of Mr. Fortune's he said: "You see, I've heard all sorts of stories about the way you Gentiles dislike us Jews, so I thought I would get close to you and see what it's all about. And this way I'm finding out what nice people you really are."

Church Uses Drama

Paris (RNS):—Reviving a custom of more than 400 years ago, the Reformed Church of France, through the Protestant Youth Council, is using the theater as a means of spreading the gospel. The Church began experimenting with the drama in 1943 when Pastor Marc Herubel formed a troop of young actors and took them to the towns and villages of central France. Their repertoire consisted of three humorous religious plays—Jeb, Noah, and Jonas. To many audiences this light treatment of the Biblical stories was received with disapproval. But as the public became accustomed to accepting the Biblical characters as human beings the plays became more popular.

Last year Pastor Herubel directed a troop of 40 young people in the production of a play inspired by the Catholic drama, "The Visitors From Heaven." Divided into two groups, each playing different regions, the troop performed before a varied audience—peasants, industrial workers, middle class Protestant families, a large number of Roman Catholics, and many who normally were indifferent to religion. Reaction was varied, but the reception on the whole was encouraging, leading the Protestant Council to plan for more experiments in religious drama.

Religious Riots

Paris (wireless to RNS):—Street fighting broke out in the Vitry suburb here when police intervened to prevent 3,000 Roman Catholic paraders from carrying a religious statue on their shoulders in defiance of a legal ordinance that such objects be carried only on trucks. The statue was the famous image of Our Lady of Boulogne, which was brought to Paris recently for special religious observances. Several policemen were injured in the fracas during which fourteen arrests were made.

More than three thousand persons demonstrated outside the Chatelet theater here after a meeting organized by the Society for the Propagation of Unity to honor Pope Pius XII as a "defender of peace" was ordered cancelled by the prefect of police to forestall possible disorder. Forming a procession, demonstrators gathered in the crypt of the Church of Saint Merri where a vigorous protest was made against the

DEVOTIONAL READING

And Was Crucified

By FRANK DAMROSCH JR.

In these Meditations for Good Friday on the Seven Last Words, the author states two aims: one, to emphasize that the meaning of what our Lord did on the Cross and what our Lord said on the Cross lies primarily in the fact that he is God Incarnate; and two, to discover in each of the Words the application to the problems of the spiritual life. $1.25

The Sign of the Cross

By R. S. K. SEELEY

Here the author considers the implications of the cross in various phases of human life and shows how its principle of liberation must be woven into the whole life of the Christian Church. At the same time he emphasizes the importance of personal discovery of the Cross and of new life in Christ. $1.60

Prayer and the Service of God

By DANIEL T. JENKINS

In this thoughtful discussion of what prayer really is and does the author clarifies many of the questions which present themselves to those who find it difficult to pray in these times. "The reader of this book will be the companion of an author who has profound spiritual insights into the need of modern man."—Augsburg Book News Letter.

Rural Conference

Valle Crucis, N. C.:—A rural leadership conference is to be held here June 22 through August 2. It includes a week of orientation, four weeks in the field and a closing week of evaluation. The staff will include Prof. Ralph Felton of Drew University; Miss Maude Cutler, director of religious education of Southern Virginia; the Rev. C. L. Samuelson, head of rural work of the National Council.

Mixed Marriages

Philadelphia (RNS):—The board of Christian education of the Presbyterian Church has been instructed to prepare a pamphlet on mixed marriages setting forth the right of both parties to retain their full prerogatives and their own religious faith. The directive was issued by the Church's general council in session here.

The council heard a report of the special committee on stewardship enlistment which summoned Presbyterians to study "the enormous contributions which Protestantism has made toward religious and civil liberty." Church members also were urged to review "the extent of freedom in nations where Protestantism dominates compared with the situation in other nations."

A further call to "study the struggle now going on in Spain, India, China, Indonesia, Rumania, Iran and Argentina for potential freedom," was included in the report.

Thumbs Down

London (wireless to RNS):—There is no possibility of any common front of Catholics and Protestants in defense of Christian philosophy, Msgr. Ronald Knox, one of England's best known Roman Catholic prelates, declared at a meeting in Carlisle sponsored by the Newman Association. The meeting was attended by the Rt. Rev. Henry Herbert Williams, Anglican Bishop of Carlisle, and several Anglican and Free Church clergymen.

"Today, when the enemies of revealed religion abound, and are vocal," Msgr. Knox, a convert from the Anglican communion said, "it is suggested they can be met by a joint demonstration in defense of Christian philosophy.

Receives Gift

New York:—Bishop Manning as president of the City Mission Society announced on March 12 an anonymous gift of $25,000 for the rebuilding of St. Barnabas House. The society is now campaigning for a million dollars to put its various buildings in first class shape after 115 years of service to the community. About half this sum is needed to rebuild St. Barnabas House which for over eighty years has been a shelter to destitute women and children.

Churchill Criticized

New York:—The local group of the Council of Applied Religion, an interdenominational group, passed a resolution on March 13 calling upon President Truman to disassociate himself from the views expressed by Winston Churchill in various speeches. The group stated that victory over Fascism "was possible only in alliance with the Soviet Union" and that "the only hope for peace and even for existence is in the continued unity and fraternal cooperation of the big three powers."

Newark Auxiliary

Newark, N. J.:—Miss Edna Beardsley, educational secretary of the national Auxiliary, told the meeting of the Newark diocesan Auxiliary, meeting here March 13, of Church work in India and China, with stress on the educational aspects. Miss Edith Lowry told of work being done in this country to raise the unbelievable living conditions of sharecroppers and migrant workers.

Scientists Speak

Washington: — A single atomic bomb as destructive as 1,000,000 10-ton blockbusters is now possible, according to Dr. Edward U. Condon, director of the National Bureau of Standards.

One such bomb dropped on Washington or any other major city may be expected to wipe out its population, to destroy its buildings and to render the site uninhabitable due to poisoning by radioactive materials, he declared.

The bomb would be 100 times more powerful than the bombs used against Japan and to be used in the forthcoming Navy tests.

And it also is possible, Dr. Condon believes, that other nations some day may turn out atom bombs bigger and better than ours.

For these reasons, Dr. Condon told the Science Talent Institute last night, this country should work to avert an atomic armaments race.

Specifically, it should welcome Russian scientists "to our laboratories as they have welcomed ours to theirs and extend the base of scientific co-operation with this great people."

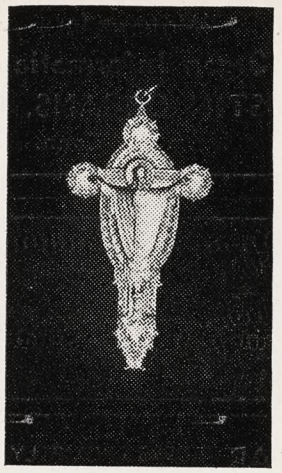
Dr. Condon called for emancipation of science from military control and for dissipation of international distruct.

Meanwhile in Rochester, N. Y., a pioneer in nuclear fission, Lee A. Dubridge, head of the physics department at the University of Rochester, asserted that the atomic bomb tests in the Marshall Islands will be a costly waste that will determine nothing but the number of ships that will sink and those that will be damaged.

Steaks are OK

London (wireless to RNS):—Roman Catholics here have been dispensed from Lenten fasting and abstinence due to food restrictions. Said Cardinal Griffin: "Being wise, mother Church this year does not demand fasting or abstinence. She tells us in fact that because of the difficulties of the times we are free to eat whatever we can obtain during the penitential season."

Pledge of Missionaries



Geneva (wireless to RNS):—Modification of the pledge requiring missionaries in India not to engage in political activities was discussed at final sessions here by the executive committee of the International Missionary Council. It was announced that the committee will consult with the National Christian Council of India on action to be taken. American delegates recalled the demand made a year ago by the Foreign Missions Conference for abolition of the pledge and said they supported this viewpoint. They contended that the pledge, demanded by the Conference of British Missionary Societies in the case of non-British missionaries, was discriminatory and should at least be modified.

The Rev. Norman Goodall, London secretary of the International Missionary Council, said that while the British mission society required the pledge, it guaranteed in turn the bona fides of all missionaries accepting it. A non-British missionary not vouched for by the society, he declared, would find it almost impossible to work satisfactorily in India.

In a subsequent interview, P. D. Devanandan, Indian delegate, asserted that the pledge interfered with support of social programs conducted by Christians in his country. He recalled that an American missionary was forced to leave India in 1944 because of alleged violation of the pledge.

EMPLOYMENT AND HOMES FOR DEMOBILIZED MEN

By LOUIS WALLIS

HOMEBUILDING is hindered all over the United States by heavy taxes on houses and by the inflated, speculative price of unused land.

Taxes on houses are far heavier, in proportion, than the taxes which a speculator pays on vacant land.

Taxes on houses must be reduced; while taxes on vacant land must be correspondingly increased, so as to bring vacant, speculative land into the market in large quantities at lower prices all over the country.

Fellowship Meetings

Detroit:—The round table fellowship meetings are being restored this Lent in the diocese of Michigan. They were dropped during the war due to travel and food restrictions. Five meetings are being held on successive Monday evenings, starting March 11. They open with a supper, followed by a brief service and a lecture, and a discussion group. Various leaders in the diocese are speaking on the theme: the task of the Church in a disintegrating society.

Deplores Reforms

Rome (wireless): — The Roman Church in Hungary faces "nothing else but ruin" as a result of agrarian reforms and other measures instituted by the new government, Cardinal Mindszenthy told Religious News Service here. He said that land was taken away from the Church and that the new government allowed only enough paper for only two Roman Catholic weekly papers.

REV. C. E. HILL
Of Williamstown, Mass.

I thought the article by Mr. Longley (WITNESS, Feb. 28) a little hard on 281 though it is true that 281 has not the confidence of the Church at large. But to have the new Presiding Bishop to provide an entirely new set-up is rather drastic.

ANSWER: Mr. Longley's contention, as we understand it, is that the top executives, not the entire staff, should place their resignations in the hands of the newly elected Presiding Bishop. He could then accept them or not as he saw fit. At least he would not have the embarrassment of firing an executive he did not want. In other words Mr. Longley suggests that the "cabinet" at 281 resign with an incoming Presiding Bishop just as the U. S. cabinet resigns when a President takes office.

HERBERT P. ALDRICH
Rector of St. Andrew's, Syracuse, N. Y.

If we are of the Church why don't we speak as if we were. I mention this in connection with Mr. Spofford Jr.'s excellent review of The Lost Weekend. Why did not he suggest that this movie conclude by suggesting in some concrete way that Birnam could find real help in solving his dilemma by turning to religion and the Church. Certainly the Church could show him the real reason why he should stop drinking. Why not, then, say so. Why should he appear to hedge by saying that Birnam should have put the bullet to his brain or have been shown on his way to the psychiatrist's office. Let's speak as if we were of the Church. Let's take every possible opportunity to make men conscious that the Church is a "must" in their lives and not an elective, by showing them how the Church can and should help them.

MRS. B. M. WALLACE
Churchwoman of Orange, N. J.

The methods given as an aid to prayer (WITNESS, Jan. 31) seem so complicated for some of us poor mortals that I pass on some others that have helped. Twenty odd years ago my son wrote to me from a boarding school of a visitor who had told the schoolboys of another boy who had to work so hard that he thought he had no time to pray. He had to go down three flights of stairs to his work and he was told to say on the first flight, "My God I thank thee"; on the second, "I give myself to thee" and on the third, "Show me what I should do this day and help me to do it." For years the boy has continued those prayers. Can you doubt the result?

I am an old women and I often find that kneeling distracts from my devotions. So I kneel little. Before rising I pray Our Lord's Prayer. Soon afterwards in summer I stand on my porch and watch the sun paint the sky and a bit of blue harbor. The gulls play about the water, a song sparrow sings on a shrub, the rabbits play on the grass. It seems as if the world about sang the Te Deum in its heart and I must join it. In the garden, in the kitchen, or on the street surely the practice of the presence of God is our best prayer as we try to do any little thing he gives us to do.

REV. WILLIAM CRITTENDEN
Secretary, Youth Division, National Council

The youth division is always grateful for your usually good handling of news coming out of this office. I would like to make one correction, however, in your rewrite of the promotion department's release on the national youth commission annual session held at Orleton Farms last month (WITNESS, March 7)

To quote the promotion department release, "The united youth offering for 1946 will be used to provide scholarship for training Japanese young people for Christian work in Japan. These scholarships will be awarded to both young men and young women." THE WITNESS article read, "The united youth offering this year will provide scholarships for the training of Japanese American young people for Christian work in Japan." I think it is of real significance that the young people, with no prompting on the part of the division, chose this project involving the training of Japanese young people and not Japanese Americans. It was a far-sighted gesture of recognition and good will towards the loyal Christians in Japan who stuck to the faith despite a considerable amount of interference from the military during the war. More specifically, the scholarship awards aim to see Japanese young men and women through college and seminary or training school. The selection of the recipients will be made by the bishops of the Church in Japan.

The young people voted these scholarships firm in the belief that emphasis on Christian educational work is essential if future wars are to be averted. I hope you will see fit to make a correction in an early issue of THE WITNESS.

REV. THADDEUS A. CHEATHAM
Pinehurst, North Carolina

THE WITNESS of March 7th was an amazingly fine issue. So heartily have I accepted our Lord's plea in St. John 17, a large part of my life has been given to the cause of Christian unity but more and more I have realized that our beloved Church must accept the taunt that "it talks more and does less than any other major branch of Protestantism." Dr. Van Dusen in his fine open letter has put us on the spot and I like to be put on the spot. If we are to be humiliated it will be because we deserve it.

The article Lent, Sin and Psychiatry by J. Clemens Kolb is the best I have seen in any Church paper for many months.

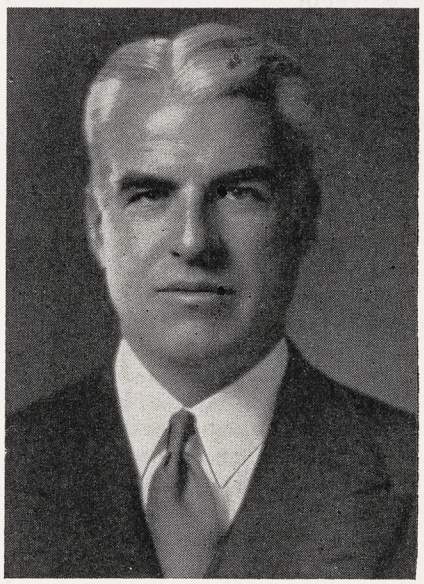
Security Council Brings Out The Basic Conflict

Task Now Is to Re-establish Communication Between the Nations to Maintain the Peace

By W. B. Spofford



New York:—For a number of days I have had the excitement of hearing and watching the representatives of eleven nations match wits over big stakes—perhaps "a big stake" is nearer the fact—whether or not we are to have peace or total destruction. I have been sitting in the press gallery of the United Nations as an accredited reporter for THE WITNESS. The details of what has gone on everyone knows since, for the first time in history, the hundreds of millions of little people have been allowed to sit in on a conference of top diplomats through the marvels of modern communication. It has been possible to hear everything said. It has been possible also to see if you are fortunate enough to be wired for television, which is doing such a good job that many reporters possessing credentials admitting them to the hall where the Security Council is meeting, prefer to watch from the television room at Hunter College where they get close-ups of the speakers that they cannot get from the press gallery.

That there is a tragic crisis in the affairs of men is putting it mildly. When an immovable body meets another immovable body what happens? That poser of school days can be asked today. Mr. Gromyko of the Soviet Union, supported only by Mr. Lange of Poland, has been an immovable body. Mr. Byrnes of the United States, supported by the delegates of the eight other nations around the conference table, has been equally immovable. Why?

The issue is far deeper and more serious than Iran. The world is not going to war over Iran and its oil. And my guess is that, in spite of all the excitement over this issue, whipped up by press and radio commentators, the conflict will be resolved. The Security Council, at its London meeting, directed Russia and Iran to settle their disputes through conferences. In spite of all the fireworks in New York, I believe they will arrive at an agreement and Iran will drop from the headlines. The pattern is similar to "the Polish crisis" of a year ago in San Francisco. Then Mr. Stettinius and Mr. Eden called a hasty press conference to announce that meetings of the Big Three had stopped because of Russia's underhand dealing with Poland. Later the same day Mr. Molotov also had a press conference and when asked about Poland shrugged it off with a casual, "Do not worry about Poland. It will be settled in due time." Today Mr. Lange sits at the table of the United Nations as the representative of that country. I am enough of an optimist to believe that time will likewise solve the crisis over Iran.

But the Iranian crisis will be followed by others and for a basic reason. At the table at Hunter College is a representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. He has one ally—the representative of Poland who is brushed off as a stooge. At the table also are the representatives of the Union of Capitalist Western Democracies, led by the United States and the United Kingdom. They also have their allies—Australia, the Netherlands, Egypt. They would resent, quite properly, being branded as stooges. They could talk of their differences with England. Egypt, in fact, is right now carrying on negotiations with England over the very same issue that concerns Iran and Russia—when are British troops to get off Egyptian soil? Nevertheless, in spite of differences, these nations are convinced that their national interests are best served, at least for the present, by allying themselves with the Union of Capitalist Western Democracies.

There are other nations represented at the conference table not quite able to make up their minds where to line up in this conflict of ideologies. This is particularly true of France—hence the role of Henri Bonnet as a peacemaker. So likewise Mexico and China, with the latter spared for the moment because its representative, Dr. Quo Tai-chi, is the presiding officer and therefore saved the embarrassment of committing his country. It should be said however that all of these nations voted with the United States and the United Kingdom, giving Mr. Gromyko the conviction, I presume, that it was a gang-up. I wish he had sat it out. Certainly his attempt to prevent even an airing of the Iran matter until such time (apparently April 10) as he can announce the issue settled, does not show a great deal of confidence in the effectiveness of the United Nations as an instrument to maintain peace.

Edward Stettinius, Episcopalian, is the American delegate on the Security Council now in session in New York

On the other hand to kick the Soviet Union in the teeth through two sessions with verbal cracks and several 9 to 2 votes is not apt to increase Russian confidence, particularly with newspapers saying editorially that we better pile up atomic bombs "just in case," and with a top-ranking United States diplomat telling the world that we would do well to start dropping bombs on Soviet cities, and quick.

The point is, as I see it, that there is a basic conflict between the USSR and the capitalist democracies. What then is the role of the Security Council in maintaining peace in the world in spite of our ideological differences?

I cannot do better, I think, than to quote an editorial from the New York Herald-Tribune. In any case that newspaper cannot be accused of being pro-Soviet.

"The Council's true role in the present juncture of history is not to 'settle' the Iranian case—something for which the Council lacks legal, to say nothing of physical, power. It is to rebuild, if possible, those bridges between the Russian and the Western viewpoints which will permit the settlement of the matter in the light of open discussion, explanation, consultation. It is not to judge the Russian case which, for all anyone knows, may be a very good one. It is to induce Russia to state the case, to explain it in the light of declared Russian principles, to make consultation and international confidence possible. This is a delicate work to which the blunt instruments of voting power are ill suited. But it is the real work before this decisive meeting of the Council."

I repeat there is a basic division in the United Nations due to ideological differences. Are the men around the conference table at Hunter big enough, and humble enough—and it is going to take humility now for someone to be a movable body—to re-establish communication in order that peace may be maintained? I have watched these eleven men for several days. I just cannot believe that they will blow up the world with atomic bombs over who gets the oil of Iran.

YOUTH FOR CHRIST HITS CHINA

Peiping (RNS):—Posters, written in English and Chinese characters, are being hung in many prominent places in the cities of Korea and North China, announcing one of the most unique Christian evangelistic movements ever promoted here. "Youth for Christ," the placards say, and the movement is inspired by the campaign of the same name now flourishing in the United States, where it has been condemned by many as being fascist in character.

Chief promoters of the "Youth for Christ" revival in the Orient are U. S. servicemen, some chaplains and religious leaders here. The meetings are international, enthusiastic and well-attended.

In Peiping, an independent Christian church near the heart of the city is the center of the movement. Local Methodists and Pentencostal Christians are promoting it, with a Norwegian missionary, now acting-manager of the Peiping Bible Society, and U. S. Marines also behind the movement. Burton Cheng, young people's worker at Asbury Methodist church, largest Protestant congregation in the city, is an active leader. Top attraction of the "Youth for Christ" meetings here is an ex-movie actor turned preacher, the Rev. Ku Jen-en. About 40, Pastor Ku has a flair for dramatic preaching and appeals to large audiences of young people.

New York:—When Dean Hewlett Johnson of Canterbury, England, visited the United States recently he spoke at a great mass meeting in Madison Square Garden for the furthering of friendship between the United Nations, and particularly between England, the United States and the Soviet Union. As he took the platform he was greeted by one of America's foremost singers and actors, Mr. Paul Robeson. The handclasp was firm, the smiles those of brotherhood and understanding.

BISHOP MANNING RESIGNS

New York:—Bishop Manning on March 29th announced that he would present his resignation as Bishop of New York to the House of Bishops in September, to take effect in December. No action can be taken for the election of a successor until after the resignation becomes effective, which means presumably that the election will take place at the diocesan convention of May, 1947. In the intervening time Bishop Charles K. Gilbert, suffragan, will head the work of the diocese.

LAYMEN VISIT PARISHES

Detroit:—The laymen's club of the diocese of Michigan has a visitation committee which arranges for visits to various churches. On March 17 a group went to St. Cyprian's, where the Rev. Malcolm Dade is rector, and there was such a crowd that chairs had to be put in the aisles. Mr. John C. Spaulding, the chancellor of the diocese, read one of the lessons. In April a group will visit the parish at Romeo, where after church service they will be entertained at dinner and then tour the city.

CHURCHMEN JOIN SCIENTISTS

Pittsburgh, Pa.: — Religious leaders and scientists of this region have joined forces in a group known as the tri-state committee of educators,

The Rev. Richard Emrich, professor at Episcopal Theological School was elected Suffragan Bishop of Michigan on March 26th. He was elected on the third ballot. Dr. Emrich has indicated that he will accept, if it is approved by a majority of bishops and standing committees. This pictures him leading the singing at a Church summer conference scientists and religious leaders on atomic energy and related problems. The move came as the climax of a two-day conference here. The committee protested to U. S. senators from Pennsylvania, Ohio and West Virginia against the Vandenberg amendment to the proposed McMahon bill for control of atomic energy. The group feels military authorities would be given too much power over atomic energy development under terms of the amendment.

BISHOP DUN ON UNITY

Chicago:—Bishop Angus Dun of Washington is to be the first lecturer on a new lectureship on the subject at the University of Chicago. He will give four lectures. November 11-14, in the Mandel assembly hall.

Protestant Ministers Answer Romanists on Spain

They Meet the Challenge of Advertisement By Also Buying Large Space for an Answer

By Charles D. Kean

St. Louis:—Because of the initiative and energy of several Episcopal ministers, official Protestantism in this city gave a public refutation to a publicity campaign carried on by the Knights of Columbus Council of the Roman Catholic Archdiocese. The Roman campaign sought to identify the cause of Franco with Christianity, and to brand opposition to Franco as "communism."

The Rev. Leonard F. Thornton, of St. Luke's Church, Valley Park, and Epiphany, Woodbine Heights, as voluntary executive of a special committee of interested Protestant ministers saw that an advertisement was prepared answering the Roman Catholic position and that it received the endorsement of the Metropolitan Federation of Churches.

For almost two years the Knights of Columbus have been running advertisements of Roman Catholic teachings and positions in the St. Louis newspapers. These advertisements have aroused considerable antagonism, particularly when their statements about non-Roman Christian practices have been offensive. No official reply, however, has been given, although the speech in St. Louis last October by Bishop Bromley Oxnam, president of the Federal Council of Churches, was regarded by the Metropolitan Federation as a positive witness on behalf of the Protestant community.

On Sunday, March 10, in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat and on Monday, March 11, in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, the Knights of Columbus published a much larger advertisement, criticizing the recent state department policy on Spain. The advertisement was captioned "Shall We Help the Communists Crucify Christian Spain."

The advertisement which quoted from Lenin, and which claimed that the Spanish Republicans took orders from Moscow ended by claiming that Spain was "the last outpost of Christian civilization in Europe."

This claim was too much for many St. Louis Protestants, but the leadership in making an answer came from a group of Episcopalians with Mr. Thornton carrying the major part of the work. Money was raised by voluntary subscription for an answering advertisement of like size, published in each newspaper one week later with the caption, "Shall We Help the Fascists Crucify Democracy in Spain." The advertisement quoted from Franco's statements to Hitler and Mussolini, cited the treatment of the Basque Catholics, and concluded with criticisms of Franco Spain quoted from Commonweal, from Jacques Maritain, and from Bishop Oxnam. It stated plainly, "Recognize Republican Spain."

Associated with Mr. Thornton in organizing the reply was the Rev. Junius J. Martin, rector of the Church of the Holy Apostles, St. Louis, who raised the Episcopalian share in the cost of the advertisements, and the Rev. Raymond E. Maxwell, rector of St. Mark's Church, St. Louis, who called the informal voluntary committee together to start proceedings. Also taking part in the project were the Very Rev. Sidney E. Sweet, of Christ Church Cathedral and the Rev. Charles C. Wilson, of Grace Church, St. Louis.

Incidentally the St. Louis Council of the Knights of Columbus ran the same advertisement in the New York Herald-Tribune for Sunday, March 24th. At this writing it is not certain whether or not the money can be raised to run an answer, as was done in St. Louis, but it can be said that there are Protestant groups working to that end.

UNION SERVICES IN CLEVELAND

Cleveland: — Two services were held here in interest with union with the Presbyterian Church. One was held in Trinity Cathedral, when the Rev. Henry Sloane Coffin was the preacher, and at which the clergy of both communions in the area were present. The second was held in the Presbyterian Church of the Covenant on March 20th, when Bishop William Scarlett of Missouri preached. Again the clergy of the two communions were in attendance. Bishop Scarlett said "The most important work of the Church is to extend as far as is humanly possible the sway of the Christian Religion. In order to bring the full power of the Christian community to bear on the problems of the day, there should be one community of faith bearing a common witness and speaking with a common voice. Who cares, in a day when the world is faced with the possibility of ultimate disaster, whether a man is ordained by the presbytery or a bishop, seeing that there is no way of limiting the free flow of the grace of God seeking entrance into every heart open to him, whether that man kneels before the bishop or the presbytery? And who can set great store, in a day when the world is on fire, on minor differences of ritual, government and practice which hold our denominations apart, when these things separating us are so trivial compared with the transcendent importance of the things we hold in common?"

At both services the churches were filled to capacity.

UNIQUE CHURCH IN DETROIT

By Mrs. John C. Spaulding

Detroit:—The Church of All Peoples here is an experiment in Christian living, planned by the local Council of Churches, the first service of which was held less than a year ago in the chapel of St. John's Church. The work at the present time is being directed by five ministers: two white, a Methodist and a Presbyterian; two Negro, a Baptist and a Presbyterian; a Japanese-American who is a Methodist.

So far the only services are the ones at 4:30 on Sundays, and these follow a simple pattern of hymns and other music, prayer, scripture reading and sermon. Almost every week there is a visiting minister who preaches, or takes some other part in the service while one of the regular ministers preaches. These visitors have been colored and white and almost uniformly high class, as has been the music. There is a permanent organist, and visiting choirs and soloists have come from Negro and white churches, including Greek Orthodox. Once a month there is a song service without a sermon, and at one of these, instead of a solo, there was a beautiful reading by a Negro member. There is no tradition to prevent experimenting, and this makes for interest.

There are occasional business meetings, and there are committees for special purposes, and to plan monthly social evenings which are held in churches or at the Y.W.C.A. The programs of these are varied with moving pictures, speakers, music, group singing, games and folk dancing.

There are a very few full members who belong to no other church, and about eighty associate members who take part in all activities. Among these are several Episcopalian vestrymen and some members of the Woman's Auxiliary diocesan executive board.

The main purpose of this church is to demonstrate that races and creeds can worship, work and play together, and already deputations have been invited to churches, and groups of young people who have attended services as part of their program.

The work is supported by the membership at present with volunteer leadership, but it has been decided to call a permanent minister, and enlarge the program to include study and forums, so help is being sought from the congregations represented. The congregation has contributed substantially in clothing and money for Europe, to aid the families of General Motors strikers, and for the Church-labor conference held in Detroit recently.

COLLEGE GIRLS HOLD CONFERENCE

Boston:—There were 75 alert college girls, representing 20 New England colleges, at the conference held in St. Mark's School, March 15-17, to consider going into some phase of Church work after graduation. In addition to Miss Barbara Arnold, provincial secretary for college work, who acted as adult chairman, leaders included the Rev. Thomas V. Barrett of New York, the Rev. John R. Wyatt of Rhode Island, the Rev. Robert N. Rodenmayer of Northampton, and the Rev. Charles W. F. Smith of Wellesley; Mrs. Ralph C. Williams of Connecticut; Miss Elise G. Dexter, former China missionary, and Miss Bernice Jansen, rural worker in Michigan, Miss Helen Turnbull of Windham House, New York, and Miss Eleanor Snyder, assistant in college work in St. John's Parish, Northampton.

DELINQUENCY COMBATTED

Tallahassee, Fla. (RNS): — An eight-point program to combat juvenile delinquency was adopted here by 100 clergymen, social workers, county and state officials called together by Governor Millard Caldwell to discuss the problem. The plan was sent to the governor for his approval. The program called for: (1) Increased community activity by the churches; (2) Coordination of youth work of various agencies; (3) Establishment of more teen-age canteens; (4) Interracial cooperation; (5) Encouragement of Sunday school and church attendance, and family altars; (6) Better care of returned boys and girls from state institutions; (7) More state aid to dependent children, and (8) Better trained enforcement personnel.

The Suffering of God

PATRIPASSIANISM, the theory that God suffers, has found occasional adherents in the Church. But belief in the significance of Christ's suffering is universal, and the fifth Sunday in Lent has, since the eleventh century at least, been known as Passion Sunday. Horrifying as they were, Christ's physical sufferings on the cross have often been unhealthily stressed—witness the morbid use of crucifixes and bleeding hearts in the Roman communion. Countless men have suffered as great agonies and over longer periods of time. But the gospel for this Sunday continues a thought which makes his mental anguish a living reality in which we all have a part. For it is directed against those whose pride of race blinded them to the spiritual truths he uttered and so kept them from God. It was this ruthless tearing of the fabric of unity which binds all the earth together that so constantly troubled and disheartened Jesus and caused him bitter grief.

It is not only the recalcitrant Jews of his day that pompously proclaim, "We be Abraham's seed." Self-pride is doubtless the greatest of all the sins for it is an unashamed avowal of one's superiority which cannot fail to blind one to the virtues of others as it carries a contempt for others. It is particularly dangerous for it so easily lends itself to rationalization. Lillian Smith in a penetrating analysis of the Negro problem, which she quite rightly sees as the problem of the white man, writes, "segregation is an ancient psychological mechanism used by men the world over whenever they want to shut themselves away from problems which they fear and do not feel they have the strength to solve. . . . For segregation as a way of life—or shall we say a way of death—is cultural schizophrenia." The same thing ran through Winston Churchill's ominous speech at Fulton, Missouri. Said he presumptuously (and, we believe, blasphemously) in speaking of the fact that, as far as we know, the Soviet Union does not possess the atomic bomb; "We sleep well in the knowledge. . . . God has willed that this shall not be."

Aye, "We be Abraham's seed!" And when Jesus endeavored to break down their smug, complacent self-satisfaction, "Then took they up stones to cast at him: but Jesus hid himself and went out of the temple." So the gospel for Passion Sunday ends—but his suffering continues through us even unto this day.

"QUOTES"

WHEN the General Convention meets in September in Philadelphia, one of the most important matters which calls for action, is a positive vote in favor of union with the Presbyterians. Not at some future date, but now at this Convention. One way to secure such action is for diocesan conventions to take favorable action upon this big issue, and instruct their deputies to insist, that the matter be brought to a vote in the General Convention and to advocate the passage of favorable action. The issue is very plain and must not be delayed longer, else we shall lose the opportunity. No matter what opposition may develop in General Convention, and no matter from what quarter such opposition comes, now is the time for positive action, to bring about this reconcilement within the Christian Church. With both clerical and lay deputies instructed by their conventions to press for constructive Christian union now, the whole Church will receive a new impetus forward which it is much in need of at this time. Too long now we have neglected the importance of this step, which please God, will set forward a new era in Christian relations among all Churches.

HOWARD KEY BARTOW,
Editor of the Church Militant
Diocese of Massachusetts

Let's Have the Facts

THE recent diocesan convention of the diocese of Western Michigan is reported to have followed the suggestion of Bishop Whittemore "to drop" the project voted by General Convention "to seek organic union with the Presbyterian Church of the U.S.A." The reported basis of the bishop's suggestion is that the House of Bishops "has never had an opportunity to discuss the matter in free and open debate" and that the merger should not be a "shotgun wedding."

If the matter was not so serious one could dismiss the matter as an example of muddy thinking but it cannot be dismissed so lightly. When General Convention voted a definite line of action, no individual diocese can repudiate or drop such action from its own consideration,—especially when the voted plan of action has not yet been completed by General Convention. Any diocese has a right to memorialize General Convention to take or to refrain from taking any action which such diocese believes to be wise and necessary, but it has no ex parte right to vote to drop a course of action once voted upon by its own representatives, as well as others.

This action is all the more to be regretted since the undertaking of General Convention involves another Christian body, the members of which may not all understand the legal impossibility of a single diocese curtly repudiating a project duly undertaken by the governing body of the whole Church. Such action is not merely childish prejudgment of incomplete action, but an unwarranted affront to our fellow Christians as well as a discourtesy to our own representatives who are striving to carry out General Convention's charge. This is true irrespective of one's own personal point of view concerning the subject matter. We do not speak to the merits of the question but only to the abortive procedure.

This affair points up the stumbling way in which the publicity concerning this vital transaction has been handled from the very beginning. Too much of the publicity has come from public or private utterances or writings of people who state what they think the commission has decided. Such "decisions" are promptly denied by other people or are otherwise interpreted. What the Church needs to know, and has a right to know, are all the documents actually involved in these negotiations and not some individual's ex parte interpretation of them. Let the commission spread before the Church all of the documents that are involved in this matter from the beginning without comment or interpretation. We are not children. We are old enough and loyal enough to our Church, whatever our personal prejudices may be, to form a personal judgment from the facts. True, our personal judgment will not be official, but it will at least give us such reasonable knowledge of the issues involved as will put us in the mood to support considered action at General Convention. That action could not possibly be a "shotgun wedding." No one who has the slightest knowledge of the Episcopal Church could imagine such a thing. On the other hand, neither will that action be an embarrassing eleventh hour appeal to postpone action without any understanding of the underlying situation on the part of the whole Church. It may be that we shall have to ask for more time because of the hopeful progress made, but then we can ask for it with a good conscience and not create the impression that we are stalling from fear or from pride.

Let the commission publish all of the documents in full before any more diocesan conventions go off halfcocked and before there is any further ground for embarrassment to all concerned.

Anglicanism: Center of Unity

by Theodore O. Wedel

Warden of the College of Preachers, Washington

THE joint commission on unity has not as yet published its report to the coming General Convention. The writer of this article is a member of that commission and cannot violate its confidence. This much may be said—the cause of the delay has not been inactivity. The cause has been the seriousness and the complexity of debate and of negotiation. I would beg the reader of this essay not to search in it for hidden prophecies of the commission's forthcoming words. The article will deal instead with general issues which have never been hidden and which the Episcopal Church faces in any or all ecumenical dreams for its future. Dr. Van Dusen's recent article in THE WITNESS has, one may hope, roused our conscience as we envisage our ecumenical vocation.

The Anglican Communion has often been called a "bridge Church." Have we ever looked critically at this metaphor describing our peculiar genius? Analysis of it might prove interesting. Few people can build homes on a bridge. A bridge exists to be crossed. Most Anglicans, as a matter of fact, have their habitations on one side or the other, though retaining traffic rights and treaties of unity with those dwelling opposite. We are a Church combining Protestant and Catholic traditions. Few of us hold these in exact equilibrium. We divide in our emotional and theological loyalties, however much we may welcome criticism and enlargement of view as we meet one another. Thousands have crossed our bridge to one side or the other for permanent residence. It is a sobering reflection to remember that, with the exception of our Lutheran brethren and the direct descendants of the Scotch Presbyterians, most of American Protestants are children of our loins. They did not find the bridge a happy abiding place. Others again have travelled our bridge to Rome. Anglo-Catholicism, while not ready to cross to Rome, invites us nevertheless to permanent residence on the Catholic side, leaving the bridge standing merely for visits to the other shore, and as an invitation to converts to cross to our side.

I would here drop my metaphor. It can, however, help to clarify the dilemma of the Anglican Communion as it prepares itself for the coming ecumenical era of Christian history. Such an era surely lies ahead. Isolationism will soon be impossible.

Only three choices lie before us:

1. We can try to remain a "bridge Church." This would be the easiest solution. We have endured our Protestant-Catholic tension for four hundred years. Why not continue? May our vocation not consist precisely in preserving our tension? God has blessed us and we have tasted the riches of his grace. The trouble with this solution is that it may soon be historically outdated. For it means isolationism. We could, of course, invite other Church bodies to join us as we are. But no other Churches live on a bridge. Hence any union would inevitably upset our balance. One group or the other in our Church is inevitably embarrassed whenever we negotiate with another communion. The alternative is no negotiations at all, and a waiting until others come to us. Yet our conscience condemns such isolationism. Hence our dilemma.

2. We can become an unambiguously "Catholic" Church. The militant Anglo-Catholic movement in our Church presses toward this end. It, too, is divided in its aim. Shall it orient itself toward Rome or toward the Catholicism of the East? Either way, however, it takes on the color of counter-reformation. Such counter-reformation may be courteous and mild, but it is unquestionably a deflection of the original orientation of Anglicanism, as honest Anglo-Catholics admit. If this reorientation of Anglicanism should fully succeed, what would be the result? Would we not become a small sect alongside the two great Catholic bodies, neither of which can really give us ecumenical standing? Would not our isolationism be accentuated tenfold? And what a price we should pay! Anglicanism would sever the ties which have historically bound it to the Reformation. To remove the Reformation tradition from our life would surely mean a great exodus—another series of losses to non-Anglican Protestantism. Have we not lost enough children already? The eyes of many within our Church have been blinded to the glory of the Reformation. We see Protestantism around us in weakened state. We take little account of the victory which Reformation Christianity has won for us on the battleground of modern thought. We ignore the rebirth of the faith in the gospel sweeping today through the Protestant world. The main appeal of the tractarian movement of the last hundred years was its preservation, though by way of traditionally Catholic forms, of the Catholic faith over against modernist liberalism. But Protestant theology is today no longer oriented toward liberalism. Hence much fear of it can now be quietly dropped. The best Protestant thought today is probably more "catholic" than even St. Thomas Aquinas. Surely, before we drift into a Catholic isolationism, we should take sober thought. For a third choice is possible.

3. Anglicanism can become the center of unity for Protestantism. This may sound like a boast and be guilty of presumption. It is a fact, however, that Anglicanism has preserved catholic forms of Church unity as has no other Reformation Church. And in the determination to preserve these catholic elements at whatever cost, all Anglicans are united. The very name of our American Church is significant. We still are the Protestant Episcopal Church.

TO THROW in our lot with Reformation Christianity—is not this, under God, our vocation? As already argued, fear of such a step was justified in recent generations. But the Holy Spirit has been at work among our Protestant brethren also. They may be more prepared than we for a new chapter in history—a great "catholic" post-Protestant era. Let us boldly cross our bridge to the Protestant side. This would not mean leaving all of our Catholic heritage behind. We should be

EACH week during Lent we will present a number of questions based on articles featured in the series: Issues Before General Convention. Rectors or other discussion leaders we hope will find them helpful but we suggest that they add to them or make up their own questions. CANON WEDEL'S ARTICLE

1. What is meant by "the bridge Church?"
2. Do you consider the Protestant Episcopal Church "Catholic," "Protestant" or both?
3. Do you agree that the best Protestant thought today is "Catholic"?
4. What does the writer mean by a great catholic Post-Protestant era?
5. What commitments would the Episcopal Church have to make in entering a united Protestant Church?
6. What are our alternatives to a united Protestant Church?

planting this heritage on larger continents. But if we take this step, there should be no illusions that it would not be decisive. Some of the comforts of living on our bridge would be over. Some of our ambiguities of doctrine would have to be surrendered. Anglo-Catholics are not mistaken when they see this clearly. Nor would I accuse them of bad faith when they oppose reunion with a Reformation Church. A decision of momentous importance is before us.

For an orientation of Anglicanism toward the Churches of Reformation anchorage would involve certain final commitments. The Reformation recovery of the Bible as norm would have to be unequivocally accepted—for example, its subjection of tradition to the judgment of Scripture, its repudiation of much mediaeval sacramental doctrine, its revolt against clericalism, and against "priesthood" when this lays claims to powers not representative of the corporate priesthood of the Church. These are not primarily matters of ceremonial or vestments or symbolism. The Reformation need not be equated with Puritanism (think of the Lutheran Church in Sweden). Here again a post-Protestant, post-Puritan, era lies before us. But it is sheer folly to suppose that any Reformation Church can enter into negotiations with us and surrender its basic evangelical convictions.

To those of us who favor this third choice for Anglicanism, no other choice, as a matter of fact, seems really possible. For is not this the vocation of Anglicanism as we meet it in the Book of Common Prayer, in the Thirty-nine Articles, in the dreams for the Anglican Church of its founding fathers in the sixteenth century, and, indeed, throughout the main stream of its history? Let us bring to a united Church our two great "Catholic" links with the Church of the ages, and we will join heartily in recognition, in our turn, of Reformation history. We find no difficulty in accepting the historic Reformation Churches as fully "Church." And "Church" implies valid ministry and sacraments. Differentiation of ministry exists, of course, and must be dealt with in reunion negotiations. "Episcopally ordained" is not a phrase that we hold meaningless. But the differentiation cannot mean a difference in kind between "priest" and "presbyter." And so with other contrasting elements in our several traditions. All are possible of being brought into harmony, so we believe, if once we grant that the Reformation schism (like our own break with Rome) was a schism within the holy catholic Church of God.

Nor can we read the invitation of 1937 to the Presbyterians as meaning anything less than that the Protestant Episcopal Church was committing itself to this third "ecumenical" choice. Perhaps it was a premature invitation, at least in its wording. "The two Churches, one in the faith of the Lord Jesus Christ, the Incarnate Word of God, recognizing the Holy Scriptures as the supreme rule of faith, accepting the two Sacraments ordained of Christ, and believing that the visible unity of Christ's Church is the will of God, hereby formally declare their purpose to achieve organic union between their respective churches." The Presbyterians are good theologians. They read this invitation carefully. It implied, as they interpreted it, an acceptance of the Presbyterian communion as "Church"—Church in a theological sense. No Christian Church in such a sense can exist without valid ministry and sacraments. Hence, so they were persuaded, they could negotiate with us as equals. There would be no demand even of their ministers that in a united Church they must "ride in Jim-Crow cars."

Perhaps they were mistaken in thus interpreting our words. Of the fact that they did so read our resolution there can, however, be no doubt. They would otherwise not have entered into frank negotiations with us. The great issue facing our Church is, therefore, a kind of "previous question." Did we mean what we said? We must sooner or later register our corporate conscience. If we did mean it, or can say it over again wholeheartedly, the door will be open for possibly the greatest venture in Church unity since the break-up of Western Christendom in the sixteenth century.

The Coming Great Church by Canon Wedel was recently reviewed and given three star (excellent) rating in THE WITNESS. It is recommended to those who want further information on this subject. The Macmillan Co. $2.

Why Full Employment?

By

GORDON M. JONES, JR.
City Missions of Toledo

"THE ordinary workman is more afraid of being out of a job than of going to hell." So wrote one Christian pastor recently. As churchmen, people interested in the temporal and eternal well-being of men, we must recognize the cause-effect relationship which can obtain between these two realities. In this land of plenty many people "have gone to hell" in the past fifteen years because there were no jobs for them.

The Church's stake in full employment, then, may be seen, first, if we acquaint ourselves with the real, if often intangible, results of unemployment. Now if ever, in this period of reconversion the Church and churchmen must acquaint themselves with and come to appreciate the effects of unemployment. With the possibility of mass unemployment staring us in the face we cannot act worthy of our Master if we are uninformed or unconcerned about such a vital issue. Jesus said, "Men do not live by bread alone." Alone! No. It is equally true that men do not live without bread. If we are indifferent, if we are reluctant to get our hands soiled by the things of the world, men may be forced to try to live without bread which brings in its wake a rise in the incidence of disease—tuberculosis for instance—and an increased population in our penal institutions, to mention but two tangible results of protracted unemployment.

In the event of mass unemployment men would die not only physically. They would die spiritually. Some may feel the first of these is not necessarily the Church's business. All will agree that the latter is. With the loss of one's job come many things in addition to physical discomfiture. These things are, must be, of deep concern to all of us as churchmen. Loss of self-respect! If you have never gone from employment office to employment office requesting a job when there was none, it is impossible to know and appreciate the spiritual death such experiences bring with them—a death far worse than the death of the body. Loss of the sense of belonging! Have you ever felt that you were not wanted? Have you ever thought you were no longer essential? Though we cannot approve, we can understand the despair which led so many to commit suicide during the thirties when the opportunity for gainful and meaningful employment was denied them. One of the blessings which was ours only with an unwanted war was the sense of self-respect and of being essential which came to many of our fellow Americans when for the first time they felt they were integral parts in the ongoing life of our nation. If America, blessed so abundantly, cannot achieve for all who wish to work this same feeling in peace-time it were almost better for the atomic bomb to do its worst. Whether better or not, the atomic bomb will do its worst if we cannot achieve full, meaningful employment in peace-time. Economic insecurity is the infection which, if it festers, would unleash the forces which in turn would release atomic bombs in the vain hope that they might bring security.

If the Church is to understand these truths it must descend from its cozy, comfortable balcony. It must walk the city streets again. The Church must get off the residential street corner and make its voice heard in factory and office building where men's minds and souls are also molded well or warped. There, too, we must bring the Gospel tidings of the Christ who died to set men free — free from every form of tyranny and insecurity, whether political, social, economic, or religious. A Church on the balcony of life cannot understand these truths. A cozy, comfortable Church will not convince men of them.

THE Church has a stake in full employment because, secondly, only as that goal is achieved will the Christian doctrines of God and man have been implemented in our daily life. If the Church, as the continuing Incarnation, believes in the essential goodness of all men; it cannot tolerate economic injustices against any man, employer or employed. If the Church believes in the dignity of every man; it cannot stand idly by and watch that dignity trampled under foot by the selfish interest of pressure groups, whether management or labor. If the Church believes that Christ was born, lived, died, and rose again for all men; it must not sit idle while some of those for whom he died are denied the opportunity for the life more abundant, be they managers, white-collar men, or laborers. If the Church believes in the inevitable corrupting nature of power; it must not remain forever on its knees when being on its feet might prevent power from reaping its deadly harvest, whether the power is in monopolies of management or monopolies of labor. If the Church believes in a God who is above all the wills of sinful men judging them; it must not shirk its bounden duty to the priest of that God, whether it condemns management or labor. These are eternal Christian truths—eternal because God ordained them as of his nature. He depends on the Church to proclaim them.

Because of its hesitancy and reluctance in the past in witnessing to and for its militant Christ, the Church has lost its place in the hearts and minds of men. Yes, what is even more important, in the wills of men, both managers and laborers. This might be well if through this loss Christ had found his place in them. The Church is still, however, the appointed ordinary channel through which he can be mediated most convincingly. The Church like every other creature of God must overcome itself, must forget its own well-being by worldly standards. It must be free from self to witness to Christ. It is not the end for which it exists. The Church exists neither for nor of itself. It is the means, or should be, whereby our Father God and our Saviour Christ may be made known to men. It is the means whereby men are brought into communion with God. Its teachings are not its own, but his. It is not traitor solely to iself, but to its Master and Founder, when it fails to proclaim these teachings—no matter whom they may offend.

The representatives of management and labor cannot in and of themselves give us economic peace. They are party to the trouble which they are trying to settle. Consequently they are prejudiced. They can never become the instruments of peace until they, too, have been freed from self. In the Church we have the message of the Christ which, if preached and taught fearlessly, can free them or condemn them. If the Church fails in this, not only will the pews be empty, but the hearts, minds, and wills of men will be turned from their Christ to men. The Church's stake in full employment is simply this: to proclaim the Christian Gospel with convincing clearness for all men that men have the opportunity unhindered by economic tyranny or insecurity, to be actually the Sons of God. Only as we do so can we be free from the charge of apostasy. The choice is ours. We, who are the Church, can choose the easy way of remaining on the balcony and watching all men "go to hell"—ourselves included for we are part of mankind. Or we can choose the hard way of taking our heritage as Christians and witnessing clearly, convincingly, and unrelentingly to it where it touches the lives of all men. The Church's stake in full employment is not its own. It is the stake of the Christ whose body it is. Men can "go to hell." They must be led to Christ. That is the Church's job.

For Church School Teachers

By

WILLIAM GRIME

MANY of you say you are perplexed with all this lack of parental support. You mention having visited the homes of your students, you have had parent-teacher's meetings, you have appealed to parents through your church papers, yet they give you excuses for children's absences that they never would dare to give to a public school teacher. Ah, yes, I know this situation does take the very life out of you, but be sure to keep up these practices, they are sound.

In the meantime try this: kneel down and ask God to awaken the ambition within you for "the glorious privilege of being independent." You hear other teachers, unable to stand this parental indifference, saying, "What's the use?" and then they look for the first chance to quit. Well, continue asking God to make you a really independent teacher, one who will not follow the crowd and retreat when the battle is hardest. Keep this up for then a great prayer like this will have a good chance to rise in you, "Father, I thank thee that thou hast matched me with this hour."

If the above suggestion doesn't help perhaps this will. First, read Luke 10:25-37. What is this discouraging condition? A lawyer is attempting to discredit Jesus in the eyes of the crowd. Notice how he solved this incident. He gave the world the story of the Good Samaritan.

Read Mark 3:31-35. What is this exacting event? He sees he must set behind him "the claims of home." Watch what he did with it. He announced that men everywhere who were working to do the will of God were his brothers.

Read Luke 15:1-24. What is this undeserved trial? The so-called best church people were resentful because he insisted on being friendly to sinners. See how he transforms this happening. He gives the world the deathless parables of the lost sheep, and lost coin and the lost boy.

Read Luke 22:24-27 and John 13:1-15. What is this bitter disappointment? His friends now quarreling as to which should be the greatest. In St. John we read that he first of all squared his creed with his conduct, and then uncovered a universal principle that mankind must either practice or else perish—greatness is to be measured by service.

Now in these instances of Jesus facing lack of sympathy and cooperation with his teaching you will discern no mere acceptance of glaring indifference and ingratitude. He did not just endure these circumstances and grow complainingly restless about them. He used them. He resolved to make something beautiful come out of something ugly. He changed oppositions into opportunities. He turned these threats to hold up his redemptive work into a good for himself and a permanent good for others.

I grant you that the cultivating of this distinctly Christian approach towards discouragements is difficult, yet it is not impossible. If in your soul there is honest desire to be found of God plus a renewal of grace that comes from "creative hours with God" you too can be more than conqueror here. Yes, sooner or later a new spirit will be regnant in you and it will break through your teaching and leap into lives known and unknown, "for the fragrance of such a spirit goes not only with the wind, but even against it."

Bishop Manning Asks Sacrifice To Help the Starving

He Urges That Food Rationing Be Restored In Order That We May More Adequately Help

Reported by Sara Dill

New York:—Bishop Manning urged last Sunday that the government ration food "if it will enable us to give more adequate help" to the starving people of the world, and that greater voluntary sacrifices and gifts be made.

Bishop Manning said there was no room for doubt as to the "appalling facts" of the food shortage left by the war throughout the world. "Millions will die in spite of all we can do," he said, "but many can be saved and will be saved by the help that we can give.

"Herbert H. Lehman (retiring Director General of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration) and others tell us that government rationing of food is necessary if we are to give help in any adequate degree. I am certain that the people of our land will accept such rationing willingly."

But government action in setting up rationing is slow, said Bishop Manning, and the need for food is urgent. He urged his congregation, and the people of all churches, to use and to waste less food, both at home and in public places, and to give money to the agencies which are sending food overseas. This, he said, would help meet the most immediate and desperate need.

Other countries will help, he said, but the United States, "with an abundance such as no other nation in this world has," must make the largest contribution. "I appeal to every man and woman in our land to do everything within their power to help meet this critical need which the war has brought upon the world," he said.

The Lenten season is a particularly appropriate time to make such an appeal, said Bishop Manning. "Our self-denials this Lent will be doubly and trebly blessed if we turn them to the help of men, women and children who are starving and dying. Here is our opportunity to minister to the bodily needs of men and to give new hope and courage to their souls."

Letter to President

Washington:—A number of ministers went to the White House last week and asked a secretary to place a letter on the desk of President Truman. It urged, first of all, that he stand firmly for civilian control of atomic energy. "Army control," they declared, "opens the door to military fascism and chaos, and it could only be interpreted as a threat directed against other nations."

The letter then went on to state that "The warning of our young scientists that unilateral control of atomic bombs cannot, by its very nature, serve peace in the one-world context of our time is confirmed by our Christian faith, and by man's experience that those who trust only the sword shall perish by the sword. Indeed, unilateral or bilateral possession of such power, which because it is scientific is international and may not possibly be kept by some from others, only leads to mutual distrust and tension in a world that depends entirely upon mutual policy and interdependence.

"We do not condone unilateral action anywhere, but concentrations of Russian troops in Iran or Manchuria cannot honestly, or realistically, be understood apart from similar concentrations of British and American troops in Greece, India, Syria, Lebanon, Iceland, China and elsewhere. In this crucial position of international forces we cannot demand multilateral policies in Eastern Europe and still pursue unilateral policies in the Americas and the Pacific. Does not international justice suggest that decisive harbors and canals should be primarily under the control of those great powers to whom such seaways are immediate and vital, with other nations participating according to their proportionate interest? Can we properly object to Russia's demands for a special position in the control of the seaways of the Dardenelles which is essential to her life and trade so long as we ourselves insist on exclusive control of the Panama Canal by the United States?

"The Churches have seen nations rise and fall because they would not accept the truth that mere trust in military power is not the road to peace. There is only a limited time in which to act decisively. It is no mere slogan to say we live in one world or no world! Irresponsible influences like Mr. Churchill's would destroy us and the United Nations Organization. Only through your continued strong support of the United Nations Organization can one world be achieved and peace won. It is later than we think. Religious insight on a deeper level than past political methods, is essential to the atomic age."

The statement was signed by eight ministers, including the Rev. Joseph F. Fletcher, professor at the Episco-

Dies in Church

York, England:—The Rev. Henry A. Dexter, retired priest of the American Church, collapsed in St. Olave's Church here immediately after receiving the sacrament. He died a few moments later. He was minister of the American Church in Munich for many years and was rector of All Saints, Briarcliff, N. Y. from 1915 to 1930.

Calls for Action

Sewanee, Tenn.:—Myles Horton, director of the Highlander Folk School at Monteagle, Tenn., told the students of the seminary at the University of the South that Christian principles must be made concrete through action. He spoke on March 20 under the auspices of the St. Luke's Society, student organization of the seminary.

Modern churches, said Mr. Horton, are guilty of failing to put into practices the principles which they profess. As a result, large segments of the population fail to see the relevance of the Church in their daily lives. This charge is particularly applicable to the main elements in Protestantism: the principal growth in religious bodies today being in the Roman Catholic communion on the one hand and Pentencostal sects on the other hand. Unless Protestantism can meet the challenge, increasing indifference will mark the public attitude to it.

Protestantism, said Mr. Horton, must develop effective techniques for conveying its message to the people and for implementing that message in social action. Increasingly, secular organizations are implementing policies which are more properly the affair of the Church. He cited as an example the activity of labor unions, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and the Chicago Civil Liberties Union in connection with the recent race disturbance in Columbia, Tennessee (WITNESS, March 21), and pointed out that a fundamental responsibility for the prevention of similar disturbances rested with the Church, and that this responsibility must be worked out in terms of removing the prejudices and hatreds which gave rise to the trouble in Columbia.

Earl of Halifax

Washington: — Addressing a congregation in Washington Cathedral here, the Earl of Halifax, British ambassador to the U. S., scored the abandonment of Christianity as the cause of the "dire disaster" of World War II and declared that whole peoples must embrace moral law if Christendom is to endure.

"Of the gravest concern to us," the Ambassador said, "is that after nearly 2,000 years of the Christian religion a large part of Europe should have relapsed into conditions as degrading as anything known or done in the worst days of paganism; as if Christianity had not been born; or as if, after brief trial, men had come to the conclusion that they had no further use for it."

The root of the trouble, Lord Halifax stated is "the idea that you separate Christian belief from Christian practice."

Urging a return to the "simple acceptance of the cardinal points of Christian faith," he warned that as nations and individuals "we have been living on past capital. Unless we replace what we spend spiritually we let the link between belief and conduct wear thin."

He pointed out that Christianity has lived through many extreme dangers in the past, but he expressed doubt that any of those dangers were as great as the "more subtle and insidious corrosion that menaces Christianity today."

Nothing was more conspicuous prior to the war, he said, than the weakening hold of Christianity upon Whole peoples. If Naziism had been faced by Christians, as enthusiastic for what is true as the Nazis were for what is false, Naziism would probably not have gripped the German people so firmly or conquered so large a part of Europe, he declared.

"If there was a latent sickness in the Christian world which remains uncured," he warned, "sooner or later the malady will surely reappear."

Blast Churchill

Brooklyn (RNS): — Winston Churchill's proposal for a "virtual British-American alliance" was condemned here by the commission of international justice and good will of the Brooklyn Church Federation. The commission declared that friendship between the two countries "is not contingent upon such joint action as contemplated in the Churchill proposals, which would speed a return to the disastrous alliances of the past."

To lessen the growing tension in international affairs, the commission advocated a U. S. policy directed toward strengthening of the United Nations Organization.

"Verbal bombshells between the United States, Great Britain and Russia should be discarded in favor of prompt and direct negotiation on the areas under dispute with orderly referral to the United Nations in the event of a dead-lock," the commission said.

Ecumenical Service

Minneapolis (RNS):—Minneapolis Church Federation sponsored an ecumenical service at the Cathedral Church of St. Mark in which a score of Protestant and Orthodox denominations participated. A feature of the service, intended to show the world-wide scope of Christianity, was the recitation of the Lord's Prayer successively in Greek, Chinese, Japanese, German, Norwegian, Swedish and Russian.

Paul G. Macy, Chicago, midwest region director of the American committee for the World Council of Churches, gave the sermon, declaring "peace will never come through a political organization no matter how fine it is."

"There must be some force that draws mankind together," he added. "The only force that is strong enough to do this in spite of individual loyalties is the Christian church."

Macy said the World Council of Churches offers an opportunity through which can be built "a fellowship which really binds people together across lines of nation, race and class."

Homes for Veterans

Augusta, Ga. (RNS):—In a move toward solving the local housing shortage, three Baptist churches and a Methodist church here have converted their cellars into apartments for the pastor and turned the parsonages over to veterans and their families. Ten other local religious leaders have moved out of their residences into relatives' homes to make room for veterans.

All local churches have set aside one day for a canvass of members to find living space. When the census is completed, a committee will call at places where quarters are available. The names and addresses of those agreeing to take in veterans and their families will be turned over to the Red Cross which will act as a clearing agency.

Lodges, clubs and business with private meeting places have planned to hold their sessions in churches in order to convert their halls into living accommodations.

Turn to Religion

Frankfurt, Germany (RNS): — Several of the Nazi war criminals on trial at Nurenberg have shown an interest in religion, according to Lieut. Carl R. Eggers, of Eugene, Oregon, Protestant chaplain of the Missouri Synod, who formerly served in the Nuremberg prison. Chaplain Eggers said fifteen of those on trial are Protestants in the sense that they were baptized and confirmed. Two of the prisoners (Von Papen and Frank) are Roman Catholics, and two (Streicher and Rosenberg) do not profess any religion.

Four of five of the prisoners, according to Chaplain Eggers, indicate a willingness to attend church services. Von Ribbentrop, Raeder, Fitsche, and Saukel show a "special interest" in religion which is probably inspired by fear of death. Chaplain Eggers was especially impressed by Field Marshal Keitel, who was unusually willing to discuss religious questions. Herman Goering is also disposed to discuss religion, but shows little interest in the Church, although he once told Chaplain Eggers he envied people with definite religious convictions. Hess has not committed himself regarding his attitude toward religion.

Joins the Union

Boston: — At a special dinner meeting of the State, County and Municipal Employees Union (A. F. of L.), the Rev. Howard P. Pardee Resigns

New York:—The Rev. Charles L. Pardee has resigned as secretary of the American Church Building Fund Commission effective April 1. He has served as secretary and trustee for more than thirty years. He was also secretary of the House of Bishops for eighteen years.

Impressed by Sermon

Washington (RNS): — Senator Wayne Morse (R.-Ore.) began the debate on the so-called "minimum wage bill" here by preaching a sermon to his colleagues in the Senate on his conception of religion — although he did not label the remarks a sermon.

"It seems to me that in American politics too frequently there is much reference to great Christian principles and not enough practice of those principles," Morse asserted. "Businessmen as well as politicians are too frequently willing to profit from religious forms and associations, but keep in watertight compartments their economic practices separated from their professed religious convictions. That remark is probably also apropos to us as a nation and as a people. Too many in all walks of life live their Christianity on Sunday and then do business as usual the other six days of the week.

"There are millions of underpaid Americans who are most deserving of a greater practice of some of the fundamental principles of Christianity applied to the economic life of this nation. There are millions who believe that our system of free enterprise can be reconciled in practice with the concepts of the Lord's Prayer and the other principles of Christianity."

Morse began his "sermon" by pointing out that only the Sunday before he had listened to what he considered a "great sermon" preached by the Rev. Alfred W. Hurst, pastor of the Cleveland Park Congregational church in Washington.

"The topic of the sermon was 'Give us this day our daily bread'," Morse explained. "It discussed the economic aspects of Christianity. The sermon stressed the relation of economic justice to Christian living. They (the millions of wage-earners) are crying out to a free-enterprise system in this country today—'Give us our daily bread'—not for nothing, but in payment for service rendered. When we consider the low-paid workers of America, I think, if we are to be honest and true to our principles, we must recognize that large segments of the American economy do not live up to the Christian concept—'Give us this day our daily bread'—for service rendered."

the committee, commonly known as the Wood-Rankin Committee.

Action by the council followed a similar resolution adopted recently by the Greater New York Federation of Churches and is based on evidence that an employee of the House committee made anti-Semitic statements. The employee is said to have told Prof. Clyde Miller of Columbia University, "You should tell your Jewish friends that the Jews in Germany stuck their necks out too far and Hitler took good care of them, and that the same thing will happen here unless they watch their steps."

The council declared that the statement "outrages American and Christian principles, reflects on the spirit and purposes of the committee and challenges the House of Representatives to bring this sort of thing to an end."

Mosely to Speak

Harrisburg, Pa.: — The Rev. J. Brooke Mosley, director of social service in the diocese of Washington, is to lead a conference of social workers, meeting here at St. Stephen's Cathedral, April 11. The meeting is in connection with the annual meeting of the state welfare conference, April 9-11. The program was arranged by the Rev. Robert C. Batchelder of Lancaster who is the chairman of the diocesan social service department.

Chaplains Needed

Washington:—Chief of Staff Dwight D. Eisenhower said last week that the opportunity for service by the army chaplain is greater today than ever. "No one knows better than I how much their devotion to our soldiers contributed to the final victory," General Eisenhower stated in a letter through which, he said, he wanted to address all army chaplains. "Yet today, with the fighting over, the need for their continued service is undiminished. Our soldiers the world over, with more time on their hands, anxious to go home and conscious of the problems facing them on return to civil life, are urgently in need of the counsel of these men who served them so well in battle.

"I know how anxious these chaplains are to return to the service of their civilian communities and it is our intention to accomplish their release as soon as the need for them in the service no longer exists. In many instances, because the rate of demobilization has so far exceeded our previous best estimates, there have been temporary local disproportions in the numbers of enlisted men and officers, including chaplains, who have been returned from overseas for separation.

"It is my earnest endeavor to release as rapidly as possible every individual not actually required in accomplishing the army's mission."

Goes to Philippines

New York:—Mr. Elmer L. Munger, for the past several years resident in Omaha, has been appointed for missionary service in the Philippine Islands, according to announcement by the overseas department of the National Council. Mr. Munger, an engineer, expects to sail for the Far East in April, and will be associated with Mr. J. Van Wie Bergamini, the Church's far eastern architect, in the reconstruction of mission property in the Philippines and in China.

Urges Rationing

New York: — Rationing must be re-established in this country if Europe is to be saved from disease and death, Samuel McCrea Cavert, general secretary of the Federal Council of Churches, declared at a meeting here of the alumni of Union Theological Seminary. Dr. Cavert, who recently returned from a six-months' stay in Geneva where he worked with the provisional committee of the World Council of Churches, emphasized the urgency of relieving the food situation in Europe.

"In spite of the fact that the winter is over, conditions will probably be most painful in May, due to the exhaustion of food stuffs carried over from the last harvest," Cavert said. "Next winter may be even more terrible unless help comes from the outside, since the lack of seed, of fertilizer, and of agricultural implements will result in the sowing of relatively small crops during the coming season."

The situation in Germany and Austria, Cavert stated, is particularly acute. "The recent reduction of the daily ration in the British zone of occupation in Germany to 1050 calories, if long continued, will mean virtually a starvation diet . . . a similar reduction will probably have to be announced for the American zone also. We are seeing the level of nourishment for millions of people pushed down alarmingly near to that of the Belsen concentration camp, which shocked the conscience of the world."

Pro-Nazi Pastors

Berlin (wireless to RNS):—Dismissal of pastors who are still pro-Nazi was demanded in resolutions adopted at a two-day meeting of the Council of Brethren, which represents the so-called Confessional wing of the Evangelical Church of Germany. The meeting took place at Darmstadt and was presided over by Pastor Hans Asmussen.

leadership has the duty "earnestly to cleanse the Church of the Nazi spirit and substance," one resolution said that "every pastor who did not speak openly against Naziism must answer whether he has not broken the first commandment, led his parishioners into temptation, and failed in his duty to brotherhood."

Another resolution stressed that one of the lessons learned by the Church in its struggle with "the un-Christian power of Naziism" was that it has a responsibility to make the will of God recognized in public life. It was announced that the Council may decide at its next meeting in May "how far it may go in dealing with political questions."

The Council urged all Protestant churches to adopt as their own the recent Stuttgart declaration, affirming the German Church's share in the nation's war guilt.

It was later announced that the executive committee of the Evangelical Church, meeting in Frankfurt, had postponed adoption of policies for "de-Nazifying" the Church until its meeting in May. They also postponed consideration of the statement on war guilt.

Barrier to Peace

London (wireless to RNS): — The atomic bomb is a barrier to lasting peace with Russia, according to the Rt. Rev. Henry Wilson, Bishop of Chelmsford. Writing in the diocesan bulletin, he said: "Russia wants peace to develop her own resources, but how can Russia, who has never shaken off her deep-rooted suspicion of this country, be sure she will be left alone, when there exists a diabolical instrument against which there is no defense and which might be used against her at any time?"

REV. DAVID C. HUNTINGTON
Waterford, New York

How can a retired clergyman afford THE WITNESS on $80.83 a month when he has to pay $1 for a pair of 35c suspenders and $16 a ton for coal which costs $2.50 at the mouth of the mine? My brother used to get his neighbors to pool their interests and buy a carload, saving half the cost, but he was a railroad man and knew how to do it. It costs money to run a paper and we need more independent religious magazines like yours in every Church family. However I think when all clergymen with jobs get the same salary then all can be expected to subscribe for Church papers. They will not be classified by vestries as $5,000 men, $3,000 men and $1,500 men, because all getting the same salary they will be considered equal. Respecting persons should be eliminated in Church affairs.

Another thing: don't you think if our nation was really grateful to the returning veterans they would be willing to give them all national parks to be cut up for building lots and let them cut down the remaining forests to build themselves log houses so that they would not need to live with their in-laws? How about the state rights-of-way, old canal beds and abandoned roads, for building lots for soldiers?

REV. ROBB WHITE JR.
Woodberry Forest, Virginia

All the points opposing the returning of our war dead (WITNESS, Feb. 28) are corroborated by my experience with soldiers in the Spanish-American war and World War I. But—all clergymen know that the people who have the say-so in questions of burial are the women, last at the cross, first at the sepulchre. And when some woman says she "can't sleep at night nor get my mind at rest by day for worrying over my beloved husband (or son) buried in some far-off, God-forsaken, desolate land," sweet reasonableness and theological persuasions do not satisfy. Legislators with an eye to women's part in recruiting for any future war probably have this factor in mind.

MR. GEORGE S. MYER
Layman of New York City

I am an obscure layman but as I read THE WITNESS week after week I wonder whether or not the leaders of our Church realize what a first rate paper you are giving us. It has been my habit for years to spend one evening a week in a public library in this city where I look over many denominational papers. There is not one that in any way compares with THE WITNESS in content or interest. The present Lenten series well illustrates what I mean: the articles so far have been on vital matters facing not only our Church but the nation and the world. And you have succeeded in having these matters presented by writers who are recognized as authorities.

To give us all this, and much more, for only three dollars a year is, I think, something for which we all need to be grateful. There is little I can do to express my thanks beyond encouraging others to subscribe. This I can perhaps best do by asking you to enter the names of three friends as subscribers, for which a check for $9 is enclosed.

REV. NORVIN C. DUNCAN
Asheville, North Carolina

The reports of the meeting of the National Council of Laymen, I see, urge loyalty to the Prayer Book. The present Prayer Book, set forth by the authority of the Church and with rubrics plain enough for the warfaring man to read, is nevertheless ignored by the use of certain missals. The worst manhandling the Prayer Book has ever had comes from the Anglo-Catholics and their affiliated groups. When one observes the holiness of life, the missionary zeal and the missionary success of our brethren in the Protestant communions it makes such statements as "only the Catholic Church," meaning of course "ours," pitiful and absurd. The need for our age is a religion which does not depend for its validity upon appeals to tradition, to the fathers, or even intellect, but to the power of the living spirit in the lives of men today. Let us have loyalty to particular modes of expression but not arrogance and exclusiveness.

REV. GEORGE A. TAYLOR
Rector of St. Paul's, Albany, N. Y.

May I commend THE WITNESS for printing so timely a review of Dr. Lowry's book on the Trinity? The Rev. Mr. Hall has made a timely suggestion. May our Presiding Bishop place his hand next Lent upon someone who will give us a book that we can all read and understand. It would be a wonderful thing if some scholar could write a book on the Trinity using the same clear, single syllable words that Jesus used in telling the story of the prodigal son.

REV. GEORGE L. PAINE
Cambridge, Massachusetts

Most Episcopalians glory in their Prayer Book and in particular in the order for holy communion. I wonder if there are not many, a great many, who like myself are distressed when the celebrant (1) omits the Gloria in Excelsis which is one of the most glorious expressions in the whole Prayer Book; and (2) inserts an extra prayer which more often than not bears no relation to the central theme of the communion service and hence leads thought and emotion away from the basic thought and purpose of the service. Incidentally, the rubric (page 84) plainly states that the priest shall now let the people depart with the blessing.

I read THE WITNESS from cover to cover and greatly appreciate the many fine articles. There is a saying that a person likes to hear what harmonizes with his own beliefs and you certainly do that for me. I think you are doing a very fine service for us Episcopalians who want the facts.

A Serious Word About Your Inherited Religion

A momentous question is looming in the spiritual foreground of today:—How does it come that the God of the Bible, who was preached by the great Hebrew prophets as the divine champion of social and economic justice, has been largely obscured behind the outlines of a conventional Deity who is hostile merely to individual "sin"? Part of the answer follows:

The Hebrew prophets began their evolutionary campaign for social and economic justice in the northern kingdom of Israel. When the northern tribes were lost, the only remaining tribe was Judah, or the Jews; and upon this tiny fragment of the Hebrew nation was thrown the entire cultural burden and mission of Israel.

The Hebrew Bible, as it now stands, was produced for us by the devoted labor of Jewish compilers and scribes, who, in and after the Babylonian exile, toiled over ancient Hebrew documents, and added an enormous mass of Priestly material which largely enters into the first five books of Scripture.

But the practical effect of the Priestly material through many centuries has been to dim out the non-Judaic "lost tribes" as factors in Hebrew history, and to obscure the origin and significance of Hebrew prophecy; while, at the same time, the tribe of Judah is put forward as the chief custodian of a revelation delivered, once for all, upon a mountain top, and coming from beyond the orbit of secular human experience. The mountain has overshadowed the social and economic gospel of the prophets for more than two thousand years.

This problem cannot be avoided. It calls for the careful attention of scholars and the sanctified common sense of the laity. Organized religion, both Jewish and Christian, must learn to find God in the slow evolution of secular history.

Commission On Holy Matrimony Submits Its Report

Resolution to Go to Convention Represents Unanimous Agreement of Commission Members

Official Report

New York:—From reports of diocesan committees as well as from the proceedings of the last General Convention, the commission has concluded that there is a wide-spread and growing feeling in the Church that for one reason or another the present canon 16 does not express the mind of Christ and does not minister to the welfare of society, and that it should be changed. With this view the commission agrees. That the present canonical attitude of the Church towards divorce and remarriage is both ineffective and untrue to the underlying purpose of marriage seems evident to the commission. The underlying purpose of marriage is to build a united and enduring home in which children will be spiritually and physically equipped to meet life successfully, and also to develop spiritually husband and wife by their ministration each to the other and to their home. Social conditions today emphasize as never before the need of such homes. Juvenile delinquency, the "problem child," and even the psychopathic child are in nine cases out of ten the product of disunited, loveless and broken homes. And such homes are multiplying at an alarming rate. Furthermore hasty "war marriages" are more and more ending in divorce. The Church is not true to the underlying purpose of the Christian conception of marriage if, in the face of these conditions, she does not clarify in her own mind her primary duty to aid in the building of united homes. This means that her legislations should aim not only at keeping married people together, however disunited they may be, but in making provision for proper preparation for marriage, in ministration to the family unit, and in the case of utter marital failures in helping to build new and better homes. This last entails a canon flexible enough to enable the Church to deal with individual cases of divorce and remarriage upon their merits which again means reposing discretion in the administrators of the law.

Your commission is fully awake to the need of legislation that will enable the Church to further the underlying purpose of marriage in the face of society's desperate need. At the same time we are conscious of the difficulties and dangers that stand in the way. There seems to be no doubt that Christ's teaching was that in a God-made marriage a lifelong bond is created, mystical but none the less real. That seems to be the meaning of "They twain shall be one flesh," and "Whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder." It is similar to the bond created by baptism whereby a child is made a member of Christ's body. It is similar to "the mystical union that is betwixt Christ and his Church." A marriage therefore which is dissolved for superficial reasons by a court may still be a marriage in the eyes of God. Christ's teaching is not a law, nor is it an ethical precept; it is a statement of fact. The ethical portion of his teaching about it is not primary but derived from the nature of the fact. We should lose more than we can gain if the Church's legislation even in the face of social necessity so "let's down the bars" as to deny the mystical and sacramental content of matrimony and its lifelong character.

Your commission therefore is deeply concerned to find the theological ground upon which the underlying purpose of Christian marriage may be served and yet its profound significance may be maintained. We are certain that such ground exists. For Jesus' teaching invariably was concerned with furthering the underlying purpose of an institution or a law. "The Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath," is the classic expression of that attitude. And to us it seems that his unvarying emphasis upon the spiritual content of behaviour, motive and intention points a way. Not that his teaching regarding the nature of marriage is a "counsel of perfection;" it cannot be that if it is a statement of fact. But the criterion of true marriage lies in the parties' consent of heart, mind and will to the union. If such consent is not given by reason of spiritual, mental or physical incompetence, or fraud, the indissoluble bond of marriage is not created.

The historic Church has faced the same difficulty that we are facing. The practice of "economy" and "dispensations" shows that she often puts the underlying purpose of a law above literal conformity to it. With regard to marriage she has solved it in the western branch by a recognition of the principle that the mystical bond is not created unless the partners are free and competent to give consent to its creation. Your commission proposes the same solution, save that we would have the Church recognize that the words "free and competent" in the Church's

This is the report in its entirety except for a preliminary statement giving changes in the membership of the commission and publications issued by the commission which have been previously printed in The Witness.

Security Council

*Everyone agreed on April 4 to do what Mr. Gromyko said on March 24 should be done. Only instead of postponing consideration of the Iran-Soviet matter until April 10, as he requested, the delegates voted unanimously, with Australia not voting, to go him one better and make the date May 6. In doing so each delegate made a pretty speech saying, in effect, that this was what he had really thought ought to have been done from the beginning. Mr. Hodgson of Australia, having moved on March 24 that it might be smart to get facts before taking action, refused to vote on April 4 since he was still of the opinion that they were without the facts necessary for intelligent action. In any case, relax—this "crisis" has passed. May we learn from it to keep more calm in the next "crisis" which will be along presently. Sorry there is not more to report but I am sure this sums up the week of deliberations, in spite of the millions of words spoken and written by the hundreds of reporters and commentators covering the meetings. —W.B.S. conception must rest upon qualities of the inner man and have a wider meaning than the civil law gives them and a less legalistic interpretation than one branch of the Catholic Church gives them. With such wider meaning their absence might not be evident until the strains of married life bring them to the surface, but even latent at the time of marriage they prevented the forging of the indissoluble bond. In one word every marriage is not a God-made marriage, but it is the God-made marriage that is indissoluble according to our Lord's teaching. A marriage in which the parties barely know one another, or in which there is no intention to form a lifelong union, or in which either does not comprehend at all the spiritual significance of the marriage, or in which neither recognizes the meaning and necessity of God's grace, or in which there is a hidden and disastrous weakness of character not evident at the time but manifest later on,—a ceremony cannot make such a union a true marriage in the Church's conception. It is, we think, true that in most marital failures the parties were never married as the Church conceives marriage. Your commission therefore recommends a canon with this theological background.

We lay the responsibility of discovering whether a marriage is a true union upon the bishop and a court. This means great responsibility for them but it is the only way, we believe, that the Church can discharge her important duty. Furthermore, we recognize that the Church should not legislate save for her own members and we have therefore specified that only active members of the Church can apply for the bishop's judgment in regard to marriage. The court will, we believe, serve a triple purpose: it will gather facts and form opinions, more objectively and efficiently than the bishop alone; it will relieve the bishop often in embarrassing situations; it will reduce the number of applications for judgments.

We have also made provisions for a permanent commission on holy matrimony to collect and codify the records of judgments so that little by little a code of procedure may be built up to guide bishops and courts, and also so that objective opinions can be given bishops and courts when sought in specific cases.

Scholarship seems agreed that adultery, as a ground for divorce, as in our present canon, has no scriptural authenticity, and we have therefore omitted it from our proposed canon. Certain sections in the canon proposed in 1943 seem to us valuable but in the interest of brevity and simplicity we have transferred them to other canons such as canon 44, of ministers and their duties, or canon 15, of regulations respecting the laity; or we have embodied them in a resolution, as in the case of the statement to be signed by prospective brides and grooms.

We are conscious of the fact that there is a desire on the part of the Church for a simple and brief canon. We have tried to comply with that desire, but we believe that the importance of the subject must have precedence over brevity and simplicity, and that we have been as brief and as simple as it is possible to be if both the cause of truth and the cause of social need are to be served adequately.

Of the Solemnization of Holy Matrimony

Amended so as to read:

I. Every minister of this Church shall conform to the laws of the state governing the creation of the civil status of marriage, and also to the laws of this Church governing the solemnization of holy matrimony.

II. No minister of this Church shall solemnize any marriage unless the following conditions are complied with:

(a) He shall have ascertained the right of the parties to contract marriage according to the laws of the state.

(b) He shall have ascertained the right of the parties to contract a marriage according to the laws of the Church.

(c) He shall have ascertained that at least one of the parties has received holy baptism.

(d) He shall have instructed the parties as to the nature of holy matrimony.

(e) The intention of the parties to contract a marriage shall have been signified to the minister at least three days before the service of solemnization; provided, that, for weighty cause, the minister may dispense with this requirement, if one of the parties is a member of his congregation, or can furnish satisfactory evidence of his responsibility. In case the three days' notice is waived, the minister shall report his action in writing to the ecclesiastical authority immediately.

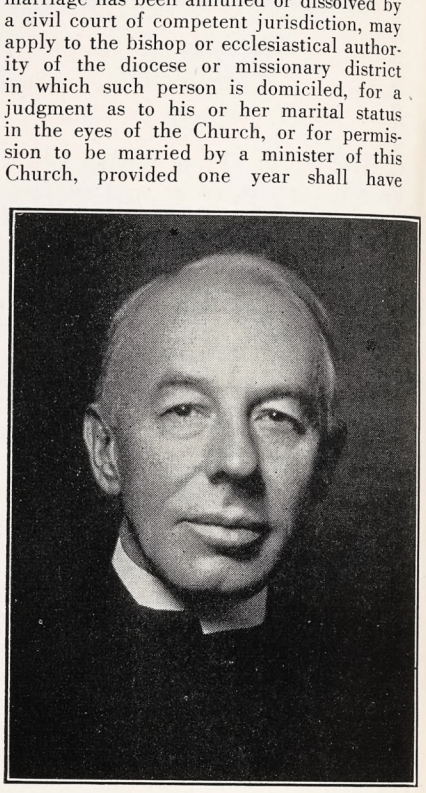
(f) (i) There shall be present at least two witnesses to the solemnization of the marriage.

(ii) The minister shall record in the proper register the date and place of the marriage, the names of the parties and their parents, the ages of the parties, their residence, and their Church status, and the witnesses, and the minister shall sign the record.

III. It shall be within the discretion of any minister of this Church to decline to solemnize any marriage.

IV. No minister of this Church shall solemnize any marriage except in accordance with these canons.

V. Except as provided in these canons, no member of this Church shall enter upon a marriage when either of the contracting parties is or has been the husband or wife of any living person.



CANON 17

Of Regulations respecting Holy Matrimony

Amended so as to read:

Sec. 1. The provisions of this canon shall apply only to active members of this Church in good standing.

Sec. 2. (i) Any person, being a member of this Church in good standing, whose marriage has been annulled or dissolved by a civil court of competent jurisdiction, and any person, being a member of this Church in good standing, who desires to marry a non-member of this Church whose marriage has been annulled or dissolved by a civil court of competent jurisdiction, may apply to the bishop or ecclesiastical authority of the diocese or missionary district in which such person is domiciled, for a judgment as to his or her marital status in the eyes of the Church, or for permission to be married by a minister of this Church, provided one year shall have elapsed since the entry of the judgment of said civil court.

(ii) The bishop or ecclesiastical authority, being satisfied that the parties intend a true Christian marriage, or that the applicant in good faith desires a judgment, shall refer the application to a court or to advisors (hereinafter called the court) constituted and prescribed for that purpose by canon of the diocese or missionary district, which shall proceed to receive such evidence as the applicant and any other person permitted by the court to do so shall present, and thereupon render an advisory opinion in writing upon the law and facts to the bishop or ecclesiastical authority.

(iii) The bishop or ecclesiastical authority, proceeding then in accordance with the canon law, shall render judgment in writing to the applicant.

(iv) If all the members of the court do not concur in its opinion the bishop, or ecclesiastical authority, upon receipt thereof, shall transmit the record, together with an opinion of the chancellor of the diocese or missionary district, to the commission hereinafter constituted.

A United Church of England Seen By Archbishop

He Urges Action in Order that Matter May Come Before Lambeth Conference Next Year

By Sidney C. Lucker

London (wireless to RNS):—A united Protestant Church of England was envisioned by the Archbishop of Canterbury, Geoffrey Francis Fisher, in an address before the jubilee congress of the Free Church Federal Council. He invited Free Church leaders to "make the question of reunion a vital issue" so that any proposals they had could be discussed at the next Anglican Lambeth Conference in 1948.

"Reunion when it comes, if by God's grace it does," Dr. Fisher declared, "will be a reunion of the Church of England. It will not be a reunion with the Church of England by you. I want you to weigh that phrase. It will not be a reunion with the Church of England, for you and I were, in origin, of the Church of England in this country, and in a real sense we still remain the Church of England in this country.

"When we come together, we become again the Church of England. But now you would come into it with traditions which you have grown in the period of dislocation, with your own customs, your own methods, and your own style of pulpit oratory. You have also your own hymn tunes and other things that matter in your daily life.

"As different orders function within the Roman Catholic Church with an identity of their own, the time might come, if reunion came about, when church notices might specify Church of England (Methodist), Church of England (Congregationalist), and even Church of England (C. of E.)."

Subsequent discussion revealed some hesitation among the delegates to accept proposals implicit in Dr. Fisher's forecast, the general tendency being to think in terms of closer federation rather than organic union.

The Rev. John Scott Lidgett, 92-year-old veteran Methodist leader, said "the historic and momentous traditions of the Free Church denominations must be held and transmitted as a sacred heritage." Another speaker, the Rev. A. Victor Murray, president of Chestnut College, in a survey of Free Church relations with other churches, said that "closer organization of churches does not involve reunion, and to say it does is a misreading of history."

In a formal reply to the Archbishop, Moderator Frank Hewett Ballard declared "if you and your great Church will go up against the evils of our times, we in the Free Churches, whatever our particular attitude to specific problems, will be happy to come with you."

Meanwhile the Church Times, organ of Anglo-Catholicism, states that an approach to union may be found in the Anglican separation of preaching and priestly authority.

"This approach," Church Times said, "might lead to the establishment of preachers who were generally accepted as at liberty to address both Anglican and Free Church congregations."

Recalling that a woman Free Church minister has been made an RAF chaplain, the publication stated, however, that if Free Churches insist on the parity of male and female ministers, "all hope of reunion is sabotaged."

PURGE OF NAZI PASTORS

Frankfurt, Germany (wireless to RNS):—The days immediately ahead promise to be tense ones for relations between the Evangelical Church of Germany and the American military government over the question of de-Nazification of clergymen. Through a new de-Nazification law, now being prepared, American authorities hope to bring pressure for widespread dismissal of pro-Nazi pastors. They take the position that the Evangelical churches have had a chance to purify their ranks but have not done a complete job.

On the other hand, Evangelical churchmen contend that the real Nazi pastors already have been dismissed. They indicate they will resist any blanket regulations which would force out nominal Nazis, who actually resisted Nazism, whatever their paper records may show.

One American officer predicted here that the crackdown will come "in three days to three months." The danger is the military will move too fast and sweepingly and then the churches which have abandoned the old position of acquiescence toward the state because of their struggle against the Nazis will be forced into defiance.

Capt. Dumont F. Kenny, of Wiesbaden, who is in charge of religious affairs in the northern part of the American zone, said the Roman Catholic and Free Churches have de-Nazified satisfactorily, but the Evangelical Church has lagged. The older bishops, he explained, have moved too slowly, but he believes the younger, progressive church leaders will bring about a clean-up.

Contrary to a widespread impression Capt. Kenny said, U. S. authorities have not ordered a blanket dismissal of pastors with Nazi connections. He said the new law provides consideration of individual cases but is stricter than past procedure in the sense that the churches must establish the innocence of suspected Nazis.

EVANGELICALS ORGANIZE

New York: — At a meeting of about one hundred liberal clergy and laymen of the Episcopal Church, held at St. Bartholomew's, it was unanimously decided that this group would constitute itself as the diocesan branch of the Episcopal Evangelical Fellowship. The following resolution was introduced and passed unanimously: We, the members of the New York diocesan branch of the Episcopal Evangelical Fellowship, would hereby go on record as believing that Easter, 1946, presents to the people of the churches a great opportunity to curtail local Easter expenses for the sake of famine relief. We believe that expenses for clothes, decorations, flowers should be drastically curbed for the sake of famine relief.

OPPOSE REVIVAL OF KLAN

Miami, Fla. (RNS):—The Greater Miami ministerial association unanimously adopted a resolution here opposing revival of the Ku Klux Klan in South Florida; disassociating the Protestant church from "such an intolerant movement"; asking people to refrain from joining the organization; and calling upon officials to stop it so far as legally possible. The action followed an appeal by the president, Rev. C. G. Johnstone, who said the press had asked the pastors to take a position.

Rev. Glenn C. James of the White Temple Methodist church charged that the Klan is mainly supported by pagans, not Protestants, but that Jews and Catholics are inclined to place responsibility for it upon Protestants.

Rev. J. Blanton Bell, president of the Ministers' Association of Richmond, Va., endorsed the action of the Miami association, terming the intolerance of the Klan a great danger to the country.

UNFAITHFUL WIVES WORRY SOLDIERS

London:—One soldier's wife in every five is guilty of infidelity after being separated from her husband for three years. This fact is revealed by a census taken by army chaplains of 8,000 British troops stationed in Italy.

With 48,000 service divorce suits pending, the Rev. N. R. M. Hawthorn, one of the investigators, said loneliness was the chief cause of wives going astray. He said most of the wives who had proved unfaithful were not young war brides but women who have been married five or ten years and couldn't stand being alone.

"In general," the proportion of troops who had been informed of their wives' infidelity ranged from 6 to 10 per cent," he said. "But there were many more cases of suspected infidelity. Absence did anything but make their hearts grow fonder—of their husbands."

He said many had told him they were sure they could "put things right" if they could just get home, but the regulations stipulate that leave cannot be granted unless the wife has run off and left her children.

JAPANESE BISHOP IS ILL

Tokyo (RNS):—Bishop Paul C. Sasaki of Tokyo and presiding bishop of the Holy Catholic Church in Japan, has been ordered by his physicians to take a rest and has been relieved temporarily by the House of Bishops here from his ecclesiastical duties.

Bishop Todomo Sugai of South Tokyo will take over as deputy presiding bishop and acting bishop of the whole Tokyo area. The House of Bishops, which met here to take this action, also passed a resolution welcoming the forthcoming visit of a deputation of bishops from the United States, England and Canada.

The House, in addition, made its first official request for the return of missionaries. The bishops asked that eighteen missionaries, all of them teachers, be sent to Japan immediately. They will be placed: six in St. Agnes' School, Kyoto; two in St. Michael's School, Kobe; two in Shoin Girls' High School, Kobe; four at St. Paul's University, Tokyo; three in St. Margaret's School, Tokyo; and one in St. Luke's School of Nursing, Tokyo.

EDITORIALS

To Those Who Witness

IT USED to be a favorite device of preachers, and may still be so far as we know, to draw a vivid contrast between the events of Palm Sunday, Good Friday and Easter. How fickle the crowd was, shouting "Hosanna" on the day our Lord entered Jerusalem and then a few days later crying, "Crucify Him!" What a triumph the procession of palms, what a disaster the cross on Calvary, and how great a vindication the resurrection on Easter day!

But such a contrast does not tell us the truth about the events of Holy Week and Easter; for all that happened then is part of the same action. The crucifixion was not a reversal of the triumph in Jerusalem, it was all a victory. Jesus was Lord on Good Friday and Palm Sunday. He was not at any point a victim of circumstances. He was not misled on Palm Sunday into thinking that there was for him some other way to triumph than the way of sacrifice. The shouts, the spreading of the branches did not change the character of his entry into the city. Jesus rode into Jerusalem as a condemned man and there might well have been a cross carried at the head of that procession on Palm Sunday, but a cross on which a King was to reign. For Christ is King as he enters Jerusalem. He is King reigning on the cross. He is King triumphant over death.

Palm Sunday, Good Friday, Easter . . . we cannot understand what happened on any one of these days if we look at one alone. They are all a part of the same great act and the key to the understanding of it is in the resurrection of our Lord. In the resurrection we see Jesus the Son of God coming in power, and looking back as we do from this side of the first Easter, we see how that power was evident when Christ rode into Jerusalem and when he hung on the cross. Take away the resurrection and Palm Sunday is a brief and empty triumph, the crucifixion a pathetic defeat. Take away the resurrection and you change entirely the character of Christianity. For the good news of Christianity is not: listen to the teachings of Jesus and try your best to follow them. It is rather: receive power and be witnesses. We must have the power before we can live the life and the power is in the resurrection of Christ our Lord. That is the essence of the gospel.

But the power is promised to those who will bear witness. It is not given to us for our own selfish use. The power is ours as we bear witness to the gospel in our personal lives, in our attitudes and actions as citizens. A considerable part of such witness today is in the struggle for justice in our world, in the struggle for such specific things, for example, as a living wage for workers and equal rights for people of all races. A Christian in America who bears witness to the gospel of our Lord will find himself involved in such matters, he cannot help it. Christ in his power will lead him into these areas of life.

"QUOTES"

THE influence of Jesus is totally unlike the influence of any other mortal who ever lived both in the intensity of its power and the scope of its activity. The unobtrusive methods by which he obtained this influence are utterly unlike the influences by which other leaders have gained power over men. And the influence which he has exerted over men is a different kind of influence than that which other men have exerted, for time has not diminished its intensity; distance is no bar to its efficacy; and differences in race and culture have not prevented men from learning the same lessons and experiencing the same grace from a personal relationship which they believe they have with him. This personal power of Jesus is something which cannot be accounted for by materialists or philosphers. It is unique.

—Bishop Johnson.

Faith of a Mother

THE WITNESS recently carried an editorial protesting against the proposed plan to spend a half billion dollars to return the bodies of men of the armed forces who died on foreign soil. It prompted the following letter from Mrs. G. T. Ruckert Jr., churchwoman of Hasbrouck Heights, New Jersey. After nine months of anxiously waiting, a young man who was in the Pacific with her son called at her home and told her and her husband that he did not believe their son would ever return. "I was grateful for this young man's honest opinion; I was grateful for a faith that has stood the test which the loss of our beloved gave it and for a Church which teaches the fundamental truth of the eternal life. It is a blessed comfort."

She enclosed the letter which follows, written for Backfire, but which we, with a sense of humility, make our own.

Entering Lent and looking forward to that greatest of all Church festivals, Easter, the commemoration of the resurrection of our Blessed Lord, my heart is full of a strange tribulation, for my beloved son, missing for nine long months, has, I believe, gone to a well earned rest.

He was just one of the thousands of lads who laid down their lives in the hope of eternal peace, and that, I believe, is his reward for God knows best.

I have read of the plan to return the bodies of our beloved ones to their homeland and it grieves me. I am sure if they could speak they would want to rest in the ground they hallowed with their blood and with the comrades who shared their trials.

Let us look at this from a practical standpoint. Little children are starving in foreign lands, the very ones they died to save. The enormous sum necessary to transport their mortal remains to the land of their birth would buy many loaves of life giving bread and warm clothing to cover naked bodies. Comrades will have to perform this sickening task and all wounds, partly healed, of the sorrow we parents have felt, will be reopened to what purpose. What assurance will we have that the body returned is our loved one, what mockery alone this can hold.

What value has the body? None. It is the immortal soul that is important and that has joined the communion of saints in the place he went to prepare for them. The spirit of our beloved one will be no nearer because we bring his earthly remains home. The spirit never left us except in that strange transition from "here to there." We hear the still small voice of our loved ones in the whistle of the soft breezes rustling through the budding trees and see it in the Spring flowers bursting through the earth. The tangible evidence of the Heavenly Father's promise of eternal life, the fruits of last Fall's death.

Mothers and fathers, wives and children, brothers and sisters of these young soldiers, sailors and aviators who made the supreme sacrifice that we might enjoy the fruits of their last labor, keep the memories of the joys you have known for God is good and he is doing for them better things than we could hope or pray for. Meet him through the Lenten season at the altar and every minute of the day in the home he loved, and had to leave, through the years until that day when there will be a happy reunion with him, who has gone a bit ahead, for he will walk slowly until you follow him.

Before it is too late let us speak our minds to those who will order this desecretion of those, who sleep in him. Forbid this pagan practice. Better a shrine in the heart that knows the pain of loneliness but bears the trial of earthly separation with faith in the Father, who doeth all things well.

The blue Pacific has closed over my beloved son, but I am content in the promise that he is safe from all harm and our home is full of the memories of twenty-one happy years, as he grew from babyhood to a stalwart lad in navy blue flying through God's heaven.

Dear Lord, I thank you for the faith that frees,
The love that knows it cannot lose its own;
The love that, looking through the shadows, sees
That You and he and I are ever one!

The Living Liturgy

The Easter Collect

FOR many people, who are unversed in the niceties of theological terms, the Collect for Easter Day seems a puzzling conundrum of doctrinal language. And its central petition appears to have no particular relevance to the high theme of that greatest and most joyous of feasts—"We humbly beseech thee that, as by thy special grace preventing us thou dost put into our minds good desires, so by thy continual help we may bring the same to good effect." A little research into the history of this collect will reveal that this petition is actually not the original one, which read: "Grant us, we beseech thee, that we who celebrate the solemnities of our Lord's Resurrection, may through the renewing of thy Spirit arise from the death of the soul." Now this sounds appropriate enough. But Pope St. Gregory the Great (or possibly one of his predecessors) decided to change it, and in a terse phrase of eight Latin words, which it took Archbishop Cranmer thirty-three English words to translate, substituted the knotted clauses about grace, both prevenient grace and cooperating grace —to use the theologians' terminology. Why did the good pope do this?

First of all, it is necessary for us to remember that our Western liturgical tradition of common prayer was formulated in a period of much debate over the doctrine of grace, its necessity, its nature, and its effects. Early in the fifth century an heretical monk named Pelagius began to disturb the Church with his teaching that man is not a fallen, but a weak and misguided creature; that of his own free will he could turn to God without any necessary assistance to him on God's part; but so great was God's love to man that he sent His only Son into the world as a pattern and example of holiness, and as a pledge of His willingness to pardon man's sins if he but turn and follow Christ. Such teaching as this has a familiar ring to modern ears, for who of us has not heard the Christian religion presented as essentially a way of life, a noble ethic, the "highest" teaching yet revealed to man? Is Jesus only the great Teacher, the great Exemplar?

It is part of the genius of St. Augustine that he realized at once the dangerous implications of Pelagius' doctrine—that Christ only made it easier for us to do what we might conceivably be able to do of our own strength and purpose. But our Lord came to redeem us, not simply to instruct us. There is in our wills a radical deficiency and rebellion which only the power of God in Christ can order and make whole. Christ came "to be unto us both a sacrifice for sin, and also an example of godly life," as the Collect for Easter II puts it. So enmeshed are we in "the devices and desires of our own hearts," that we cannot even turn to God without His inward, prompting love (prevenient grace), much less can we lead "a godly, righteous, and sober life" without His continuing, assisting help (cooperating grace). Christianity is, as St. Augustine clearly understood, more than a religion of enlightenment; it is first and foremost a religion of redemption.

We may be thankful, therefore, to Pope Gregory, an avid student of St. Augustine's writings, for the form which he gave to our Easter Collect. It is well to remind ourselves on 'our triumphant and holy day' that all we are and have and hope to be, save our sin, and every grace of heart and mind and sense which we possess are of God's prevenient and sustaining grace; and that through the victory wrought by Christ's perfect offering and obedience He has done for us what we could never do in and through and of ourselves. The Easter Collect is the key which unlocks the meaning of all our other collects. They explain it and comment upon it: "O God, from whom all holy desires, all good counsels, and all just works do proceed;" "they who do lean only upon the hope of thy heavenly grace;" "O Lord God, who seest that we put not our trust in any thing that we do;" "create and make in us new and contrite hearts;" "who alone canst order the unruly wills and affections of sinful men;" "through the weakness of our mortal nature, we can do no good thing without thee, grant us the help of thy grace;" "we, who cannot do any thing that is good without thee, may by thee be enabled to live according to thy will;" "of whose only gift it cometh that thy faithful people do unto thee true and laudable service." Is the Easter Collect so strange and inappropriate after all?

Is Marriage Indissoluble?

by Edward L. Parsons

Retired Bishop of California

THE question before the Church in this matter of marriage and divorce is not whether Christian marriage ought to be indissoluble. That may be taken for granted. The question concerns the ecclesiastical doctrine of indissolubility, its relation to the teaching of our Lord and its relevancy to the present American situation.

The reflections which follow make no claim to originality. They fall back upon the researches and judgments of many competent scholars. They try only to put in a brief paper the way it looks to one who believes that the test of Christian teaching is, as our Lord seemed always to insist, what it does to life.

Let us begin then by assuming that the uncompromising statement of Jesus which is claimed to be the basis of the doctrine of indissolubility is accurately reported. Let us put it over against such a typical case as is usually adduced in those arguments, think about it and see where it leads us.

Take for example the case of a girl of eighteen, married to a man whom she discovers immediately to be a profligate. He makes no secret of his adulteries. He drinks. He treats her with such physical violence that after a few months she does not dare continue to live with him. She divorces him. Two or three years later she meets, falls in love with and marries a Christian gentleman, clean and fine. In what sense is she living in adultery and what is the Church to do about it?

Now Jesus certainly speaks universally. It is clear that he is not speaking to the Christian Church for there was no Church, in any ecclesiastical sense, at the time. He is actually addressing a group of Jews, but his words are for all men of any race and any time. His words have the universal validity of "Thou shalt not kill" or "Blessed are the pure in heart." If that is true it seems also fairly clear that Jesus can not be hurling a blanket charge of adultery at all the strange marital arrangements, other than an indissoluble monogamy, which men have tried. Probably no one claims that he is although his words imply it. Everyone realizes that some accommodation must be made.

It can be made, it seems to me, only by remembering that all our Lord's teaching is on the level of the Kingdom of God and not on that of the Church or of secular society. But when you are talking of the Kingdom you are dealing with moral and spiritual values; you are in an ideal world. Your practical problem is to bring this ideal world effectively into the every day life of man without blurring the distinction between the absolute and the relative.

Our Lord, as I conceive it, is enunciating a great and wonderful truth. He is taking marriage out of the realm of convenience or of natural and obvious sex attraction and making it a sacred and eternal thing. He is suggesting a divine beauty which men had never surmised before. According to the ethics of the Kingdom of God marriage is not indissoluble in a technical, doctrinal sense. It is rather a life-long union which no one would ever think of dissolving. It cannot be separated from moral and spiritual values and it cannot be realized without those values.

It is this which Jesus was expressing when he says that "from the beginning it was not so." That is to say, the purpose of God is achieved when the man and woman leave father and mother and become one flesh. They become a new unit in society; the nucleus of another family. That is the purpose of God in creating them male and female. Our Lord shared the contemporary view that this was somehow realized in Adam and Eve before the fall, and therefore the ideal and purpose of God could be expressed in what appear to be historical terms. But it is perhaps not stressing the letter too much to point out that there is a suggestion in the use of the future, "shall leave," "shall cleave," "shall be," not only that this union is something to be achieved but that it is achieved by the voluntary action of the persons involved.

My next point is that the use of the phrase "Whom God hath joined together" implies that Jesus is envisaging the kind of marriage in which God is really a creative factor; a marriage which is within the range of the ethics of the Kingdom of God. I don't find any such factor recognized in the doctrine of indissolubility, but that factor is essential. It is incredible, in the light of our Lord's other teaching, that he intended to declare that the most essential relationship into which man can enter may be achieved in a moment of thoughtless excitement by purely outward and physical means. It must be remembered that Jesus makes no statement as to what constitutes a valid marriage. Any marriage which society recognizes is apparently valid. There is no limiting it to Christian marriage. It is incredible, I repeat, that he whose whole teaching, whose whole life on earth, was given to leading men away from the externals of religion and back to the essential meaning of life in God, could mean that marriage undertaken quite thoughtlessly, at which a civil officer officiates, consummated by one night together, is what God meant and that the life-long destiny of those two people is settled in the "forum of heaven." That is pure magic. It is tying God's action up to a formula of words. And note this corollary—under the doctrine of indissolubility these parties may separate but neither can marry again. If however it happens, as it has often happened, that the young girl has yielded to the man's persuasion and spent the night with him without the marriage ceremony, then there is no obstacle whatever to her marrying later and, assured of God's forgiveness if penitent, living and bringing up her children in a godly home. If she is virtuous enough to refuse to go with him unless they are married and finds the next day that she made an awful and tragic mistake, under the doctrine of indissolubility she can never fulfil the normal life of a woman.

For Lenten Discussion

EACH week during Lent we will present a number of questions based on articles featured in the series: Issues Before General Convention. Rectors or other discussion leaders we hope will find them helpful but we suggest that they add to them or make up their own questions. We add that authors are alone responsible for their contributions, the views expressed not necessarily being those of the editors.

1. Discuss the statement that "All our Lord's teaching is on the level of the Kingdom of God and not on that of the Church or of secular society."

2. Did Jesus think that the ideal marriage is something yet to be achieved?

3. Do you believe that after separation neither party should marry again?

4. Do you agree that the marriage service of the Prayer Book is a simple, searching and beautiful expression of what Christian marriage means? Read the service together and discuss it.

5. Do you think that continence is "not only abnormal but definitely harmful?"

It is, I say again, incredible. It is magic such as has so often degraded the great sacraments of the gospel. Of course the case I have adduced may be dealt with ecclesiastically on the ground that one of the parties was not baptized or that it was not a Christian marriage. But our Lord says nothing about that and I don't need to point out that every year there are plenty of marriages performed by Christian ministers—yes by men who value their catholic priesthood—which are precisely as lacking in God's creative relationship as the one I have described. The whole affair may be transacted with the Prayer Book service and for baptized Christians. The doctrine of indissolubility is the degradation of a great sacramental rite.

The Prayer Book office, to which many who advocate the indissolubility of marriage constantly refer as if it taught that doctrine, takes no such position. It is a simple, searching and very beautiful expression of what Christian marriage means. It is from beginnng to end permeated and controlled by spiritual and moral considerations. It would forbid any to come who are not acting in the fear of God. The weakness of the position of those who hold to the doctrine of indissolubility is that if these persons do come without the fear of God they hold that it does not matter. But the Prayer Book says no such thing. It goes on to require vows of a life-long love and faithfulness. It heaps up words with superb power to make clear that this relationship, so profound, so essential to society and taking precedence of all others, is moral and spiritual. It calls for the most complete self-surrender; for the highest exercise of the great Christian virtues. Here is the meaning of the Christian marriage. Here is the thing which every Christan ought to seek as he enters upon marriage. To say that without the attempt to achieve such an end you have what Christ meant when he uttered the famous logion seems to me clearly putting the really first things last, and what is the least essential of the essentials first. The case which I suggested at the beginning is socially a marriage but from the point of view of the Prayer Book office and the Christian ideal it is scarcely a marriage at all. Quite properly we recognize it and all other legally celebrated marriages as such. But when it comes to the question of divorce and what to do about it we are dealing with what has next to no claim to be called Christian marriage at all—marriage such as our Lord desired.

There is another point to make concerning another moral aspect of the matter. Whatever values celibacy has to offer in men's search for God, no one doubts that the normal life of men and women is not celibate. In these days I suppose most intelligent people agree that the vast ascetic and monastic movements in earlier Christian history, although they made real contributions to civilization, cramped rather than expanded the meaning of the Christian life. Now the doctrine of indissolubility applied to such cases as we have in mind denies to the woman, or the man, the achievement of the normal life altogether, because of an early and bitterly repented mistake—not a sin but a mistake. Of course a Christian should be able to practice continence. It is a great virtue, but there seems no reason that I can find why it should be required under such circumstances. And the proposal that in the case of a mistaken or sinful marriage after divorce the man and woman should live as "brother and sister" is asking what is not only abnormal but definitely harmful. Yes, a Christian can learn to sublimate passion, but let him do it when a normal and essential end is to be reached and only then.

Our task is to find some way, without injustice and essential moral wrong, to bring our own people and the world up to the ideal which our Lord puts before us. It is a difficult task. It cannot be achieved on the basis of ecclesiastical legislation but since we must have legislation, let us not in working it out lose sight of the necessity of God's creative activity if Christian marriage is to be really Chrstian.

Notes On Soviet Education

By

ADELAIDE CASE
Professor at Episcopal Theological School

RECONSTRUCTION and Advance has been presented to the Church not only as a campaign for raising money to rebuild Christian missions and help the churches in Europe but also as a spiritual crusade for a better and more fraternal world. If it is to be this spiritual crusade it must surely include within its scope a sincere effort to understand that great nation which has been a persistent mystery to so many of us and upon which, to such a large extent, the future peace of the world depends. I refer of course to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, a nation which includes more than 180 million people.

As a small contribution to this effort I should like to call attention to some of the educational developments in Russia since the revolution. These are outlined and discussed, for those who want greater detail, in the Information Bulletin for December 27th, 1945, issued by the Embassy of the USSR.

Universal education financed by the state has always been an element in Soviet doctrine. The original constitution included the revolutionary statement, "All citizens have the right to education," and a tremendous movement to combat ignorance and illiteracy characterized the early days of the republic. Under the old regime only 4.7 per cent of the population had attended school and millions could neither read nor write. It was not until 1930, thirteen years after the establishment of the Soviet rule, that four years of elementary education became compulsory throughout the country. In the three years between 1928 and 1931 the elementary school population jumped from 8,770,000 to 13,456,000.

Kindergartens for children three to seven are conducted by the state but attendance is not required. In 1919 there were only 275 kindergartens. In 1940 there were more than 55,000 caring for over two million children.

Besides kindergartens and creches there are three types of state schools: the four-year or primary schools which children enter when they are seven years old; the seven-year or junior secondary schools which include the primary grades and three additional years; and the ten-year or secondary schools, including the other grades and three additional years.

Higher education, normally highly technical, is available for those who can qualify for it. In twenty years, from 1920 to 1940, the number of higher educational institutions increased from 91 to 782, and before the war there were as many as 11,795,000 enrolled as correspondence students. Under the Tsarist regime only fifteen per cent of university students were women. In 1938 women made up forty-three per cent of the university population.

The five year plan of 1938-42 called for ten-year schools in all cities and the development of seven-year schools in rural districts. The success of this effort is shown in the following figures. In 1914 there were five and a half million pupils in Russian schools. In 1928-29 there were more than seven and three-quarters million. In 1932 there were 13,342,200, and in 1939, 20,408,800.

Russian education was seriously interrupted during the war. In that period specific military activities took up a considerable portion of school life. In 1943, for instance, eleven per cent of the time in boys' schools was given to military and physical training and boys of the three upper classes were required to attend summer camps for special military instruction.

Institutions of higher learning were reduced during the war to a low of 460 but have come up again (1945-46) to 772 with a student body of 560,000. The present five year plan will encourage a great development of university technical education in order to produce the specialists who are so urgently needed, including the teachers upon whom the whole educational system depends.

TO UNDERSTAND the educational principles on which education in Russia is organized these four points need to be kept in mind.

1. Education in Russia is intended to develop citizens who are thoroughly equipped to serve the military needs of the country. Only if a strong assurance of peaceful cooperation between nations replaces the constant threat of war will there be a change here.

2. Education in Russia is polytechnized. "Labor is the universal shaft around which education rotates." Early specialization is encouraged, but the comprehensive understanding of the central place of labor in life is what is wanted, together with a broad view of the country's needs.

3. Education in Russia, like public education in the United States, is secular, free from Church control. This follows from a decision of the people's commissariat for education in 1918 which reads, "Considering that religion is a matter of conscience for every individual, the state in religious matters remains neutral, i.e., it does not back any particular religion, does not grant any rights or privileges, nor does it support any particular religion materially or morally. It follows from this that the state does not undertake the task of religious education of children."

4. Education in Russia has definite ethical aims. Its general aim has been officially stated. It is "to give general education to the citizen and to make him a useful member of the community." In Rules for Pupils, approved by the government, there is this statement: "They (the pupils) are expected to be kind and helpful to old people, small children, the weak and ill. They must give them first place and offer them their seats in trams and buses and assist them in every way." "The new man," says a recognized leader, "must be infused by the best qualities of man. . . . These qualities are love of the people and for the working masses, honesty, courage, solidarity, and love of work."

Appreciation of the gigantic educational achievements of Soviet Russia and the immense problems still before her does not necessarily carry with it agreement in basic ideology. But such appreciation is socially important and spiritually essential. Certainly it helps to lay the ground work for a Reconstructed world and for Advance in true brotherhood.

Ecumenical Service at Trinity Attracts Large Crowd

Religious Liberty and Democracy Subject Of an Address by Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam

Edited by Sara Dill

Boston: — Frank arraignment of the policy and practice of the hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church as a threat to religious liberty and the American ideal of democracy was made by Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam, president of the Federal Council of Churches, in his address at a great ecumenical service in Trinity Church. The occasion was sponsored by the Protestant and Eastern Orthodox Churches of Greater Boston and attended by a huge congregation of 2,000 persons while hundreds were turned away for lack of room.

Bishop Lewis O. Hartman, president of the Massachusetts Council of Churches, who succeeded Bishop Oxnam as resident Bishop of the Methodist Church in the New England area, conducted the service and Bishop Henry Knox Sherrill introduced the speaker. Participating clergymen were: the Rev. Theodore P. Theodorides of the Greek Orthodox Cathedral; the Rev. Robert B. Day, executive director, Benevolent Fraternity of Unitarian Churches; the Rev. Isaac Higginbotham, executive secretary, Massachusetts Baptist Convention; the Rev. Ralph M. Timberlake, president, Massachusetts Congregational Conference and Missionary Society; the Rev. Frank Jennings, executive secretary, Massachusetts Council of Churches. The service was the first of its kind in Boston and visibly demonstrated that there is a unity of Protestantism that can disregard credal differences.

The subject, "Religious Liberty and American Democracy," had been chosen by the Federal Council of Churches.

Where Roman Catholics are in the majority throughout the world, their Church attempts to restrict religious liberties, declared Bishop Oxnam. Evidence cited included the persecution and restrictions on Protestant missionary groups in Spain, Peru, and Mexico. Moreover, it was charged, even in the United States, Protestants are gravely concerned about Roman Catholic pressures on newspapers, radio, and other sources of information, thus constituting a threat to political and religious freedom.

Bishop Oxnam described the Roman Church as opposed to separation of Church and state as a principle, but accepting it as a temporary expedient, and that this toleration of other faiths, in his opinion, was not necessarily a permanent commitment. With reference to Protestant opposition to United States diplomatic representation at the Vatican, he asserted it a violation of the American principle of Church and state, and that while such representation may have been a wartime necessity, that explanation is no longer valid.

The address was an appeal to the Roman Catholic Church to be a Church, rather than a combination of state and Church, and, in matters of religious liberty to do unto others as it would be done by. Bishop Oxnam recognized the difficulty he faced in making such an appeal, saying "When a Protestant speaks of the abuse of privilege by the hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church, he is immediately portrayed as attacking that Church." This, he added, is not true, for the Protestant stands ready to protect the religious liberty of the Roman Catholic, even as he likewise stands ready to resist those practices that are political and designed to secure secular privilege.

Evangelical Meeting

Louisville, Ky.: — Evangelical Churchmen of the middle-west and south will hold a two-day conference in Christ Church Cathedral, Louisville, on Tuesday and Wednesday, May 7 and 8, as one of the two such conferences to be held in May under the auspices of the Episcopal Evangelical Fellowship. A similar gathering for Eastern Evangelicals will be held in Washington later in the month. The purpose of the Louisville gathering is to provide an opportunity for an understanding and discussion of the movement for unity with the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. and for the need for revision of the marriage canon. There will also be discussion of the need for Evangelical unity. Final arrangements for speakers have not been completed as yet, but the program will include addresses by Bishop Tucker of Ohio and Bishop Scarlett of Missouri.

The conference is the result of similar plans made by a committee of the diocese of Missouri and a committee of fourth province evangelicals. The two committees decided to join forces, and accepted the invitation of the Kentucky group to meet in Louisville. Laymen and clergymen are both invited to attend.

The conference committee includes Bishop Charles Clingman of Kentucky; Dean Norvell Wicker of Christ Church, Cathedral, Louisville, the Rev. R. Malcolm Ward, of St. Paul's Church, Maumee, Ohio; the Rev. J. R. Pattie, of the Church of the Ascension, Lakewood, Ohio; Dean Sidney E. Sweet of Christ Church Cathedral, St. Louis; the Rev. Charles D. Kean, of Grace Church, Kirkwood, Missouri; the

Bomb in Church

Great Barrington, Mass.:—Weird yellow-green flashes illumined a tall glass tube above the pulpit. Crackling noises echoed from the hallowed church walls. The congregation watched and listened with breathless attention as the preacher launched into a colorful imaginary description of the destruction of New York city. The atom bomb had come to church.

For the third of a series of Lenten talks on current problems, the Rev. Richard Mortimer-Maddox, rector of St. James', had persuaded a friend to set up in the church an apparatus for recording fast particles, a device used by the Manhattan atomic project under the name of Geiger-Counter. The friend, John B. Orr, Jr., an amateur physicist, had built the apparatus in his private laboratory in South Egremont Mass., where, in his spare time, he has conducted research on nuclear fission and radiation. The flashes resulted as electrons tripped current into the glass tube and the fascinating echoes emanating from this reaction were amplified through a microphonic system. The imaginary description of New York's atomic doom prefaced the rector's talk on the facts, dangers and hopes of atomic fission.

Council of Churches

Boston: — A number of clergymen of Massachusetts were elected directors of the local council of churches which represents all Protestant denominations and sponsors many interdenominational efforts. Elected were the Rev. Philip E. Anthes of East Boston, the Rev. Kenneth deP. Hughes of Cambridge, the Rev. F. C. Lawrence of Brookline, the Rev. Robert G. Metters of Boston.

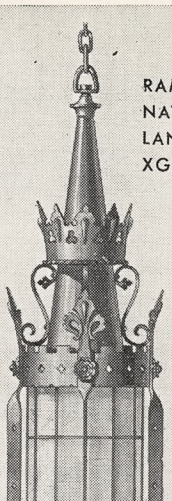
Spiritual Therapy

San Diego, Calif.: — The Rev. John Gayner Banks, director of the Fellowship of St. Luke, is holding a number of missions during the month on spiritual therapy. One opened April 7th at Christ and St. Luke's, Norfolk, Va., which will be followed by one at the Church of Our Saviour, Philadelphia, April 14-19. On April 28th he is to open a five day mission at the Church of the Heavenly Rest, New York, with one at St. Stephen and the Incarnation, Washington, May 5-10.

Flowers vs. Food

New York:—Easter flower decorations at St. George's here will be at a minimum this year. Instead the money will go for the relief of famine sufferers throughout the world. Rector Elmore McKee also announced last week that the annual custom of giving a plant to the children will be foregone, by their own vote.

Incidentally a columnist in a Philadelphia paper called attention to the fact that at a tea party given by Bishop and Mrs. Dun of Washington as a farewell to Lord and Lady Halifax, the sandwiches were of dark bread and were open-faced. Neither Mrs. Dun nor Lady Halifax wore flowers; instead on the mantle was a large crayon sketch of a corsage with thirty names inscribed on it—names representing British families which have received packages of food from friends of Mrs. Dun. "I do wish more people would think such thoughts rather than send expensive gifts of flowers," was the comment of Bishop Dun.



Fascist Underground

Berne (wireless to RNS):—Pastor Martin Niemoeller, who spent eight year in a Nazi concentration camp, has been "condemned to death" by the Fehm, nationalist underground organization in Germany, according to a report here. Placards announcing the sentence were reported displayed at Goettengen, in Hanover province, Prussia. It was said Niemoeller had been condemned because of his statements acknowledging German war guilt.

The report quoted Mrs. Niemoeller as stating she is more concerned over the safety of her husband now than she was during his internment by the Nazis.

The Fehm movement is a revival of ultra-nationalist secret organizations which came into existence after the Napoleonic and the first world wars. Actually, however, it traces back to the Vehmgericht, secret irregular tribunals which prevailed in Germany from the 12th to the 16th century, and which inspired such terror that they were ultimately abolished. The new Fehm movement is said to include many German intellectuals.

India Pledge

Buck Hill Falls, Pa. (RNS) : — No action was taken by the foreign missions conference at its annual meeting here on the pledge required by the British government binding Christian missionaries to abstain from political activity while working in India. The conference was informed that the council of British missionary societies had asked that no pressure be put on its government at the present time. In accordance with this request, the International Missionary Council did not press for action toward abolition of the pledge during its sessions at Geneva in February.

Instead, it was reported, the International Missionary Council will renew its consultations with the National Christian Council in India, giving particular emphasis to the "safeguarding of missionary freedom in the framing of India's new constitution."

Social Relations

Providence:—The report of the department of social relations of the diocese of Rhode Island, submitted last week, indicates active and vigorous leadership in many religious and social organizations in the state. It has dealt during the year with delinquency, probation and parole, mental deficiency, old age employment, race relations and many other issues. The chaplaincy service, with six part time clergy and lay workers, during the year held over 400 services, responded to 65 emergency calls, interviewed over 600 prisoners took part in 25 case conferences, made over 10,000 bedside visits.

Canon Richard Lief, director, was this year the president of the conference of social work of the state and served on the boards of many social and religious agencies.

Atomic Bomb

Philadelphia: — By building an "Ark of Peace," man has it within his power to make the atom bomb an instrument for good. This was the message which a teacher and two high school students from Oak Ridge, Tennessee brought to Christ Church in Philadelphia when they addressed a service there as part of a city-wide speaking tour. Speaking solemnly of the immediate problems raised by the bomb which their parents helped to manufacture were Joyce Griggs and Dee Chambliss, both 16, two of the seven young people who made the trip. They were accompanied by their English teacher, Philip E. Kennedy. "If there is one thing which we have at Oak Ridge which you do not have here, it is a sense of urgency," Kennedy said. "If you can see and feel that in us, we will have accomplished our purpose here today." The teacher told the story of the Ark, comparing the flood with the atomic crisis. He said that if we are not to be engulfed, we must build an Ark called peace. "People are good," Kennedy added. "Given facts, their judgment is good. Therein lies our faith."

"Hope is a big word," said Joyce, whose father is an iron worker, "without it we have no progress, no advancement. All the talk today is of fear not hope. This we need to change. We talk today of bombing, not of raising living standards and curing disease. Can't we use our power for something besides killing"

Spokesman for charity was Dee, editor of the Oak Ridge school paper and the son of a physicist. He quoted the warning of a scientist that 40 million lives might be wiped out at one stroke by atomic warfare, terming the idea "unbearable."

"When the people of one nation become personally concerned with the welfare of the people of another nation," he said, "we will have the charity we need."

Both Joyce and Dee are members of the Youth Council of the Atomic Crisis of Oak Ridge which was organized following class discussions.

New Churches

Philadelphia: — Two new churches have been started in the rapidly developing suburban territory around this city. On March 31 ground was broken for St. Peter's, Broomall, by Bishop Hart. Services are meanwhile being held in a nearby public hall by the vicar, the Rev. Frederick Valentine. On April 7th Bishop Hart conducted a service for the blessing of the site of St. Peter's, Oreland, where services are at present conducted in a fire house by Layreader Norman C. Harvey. Hundreds of houses have been recently constructed in both area, with even more now under construction.

Priests Conference

Philadelphia: — Unity and marriage are the two subjects to be considered at a priests' conference to be held here at Holy Trinity April 30-May 2. There will be papers by the Rev. Leister C. Lewis of New York; the Rev. Don Frank Fenn of Baltimore; the Rev. Howard Klein, former chaplain. Bishop Hart is to be the celebrant at a communion service, assisted by Bishop Remington.

Council of Churches

Buck Hills Falls, Pa. (RNS): — The foreign missions conference of North America voted at its annual meeting here to take final action in 1948 on the question of joining the proposed National Council of the Churches of Christ in the United States. In its report to the conference, the committee on closer relationships of general interdenominational agencies stated that its work had been practically in abeyance during the past year.

Creation of a National Council of Churches of Christ in America would unite eight groups: the Federal Council of Churches, the Foreign Missions Conference of North America, the Home Missions Council, the International Council of Religious Education, the United Council of Church Women, the United Stewardship Council, the Missionary Education Movement, and the Council of Church Boards of Education. Its formation has been approved by the Federal Council and the Home Missions Council.

Stop Building

Washington (RNS): —The sweeping "stop construction" order announced here by the national housing administration and the civilian production administration necessarily will postpone building plans of churches and church-related institutions, but government officials expressed hope that the delay would be only a matter of months.

"We realize that the order will be a handicap to ministers, rabbis, priests and officials of church-related institutions who had been planning to begin construction in the immediate future on new buildings, but we believe they are willing to wait if the order means more homes for veterans—as it does," one high official said here.

The "stop" order, effective immediately, permits completion of

Millions for Relief

Niagara Falls, Ont. (RNS):—Denominations affiliated with the western hemisphere section of the World Alliance of Presbyterian and Reformed Churches will spend more than $6,000,000 for European relief and church reconstruction in cooperation with the World Council of Churches during the next few years.

This was affirmed by leaders, representing 4,000,000 members of seven communions, who attended the annual western section meeting here. The alliance accepted an invitation from its eastern counterpart, the eastern alliance in Europe, to hold a world conference in Europe during 1947 to take action on rebuilding war-ravaged churches.

Denominations in North America which will be represented at the world conference are: The Presbyterian Churches in Canada and the United States, the Evangelical and Reformed Church, the Reformed Church in America, the United Presbyterian Church and the United Church of Canada.

The Rev. William B. Pugh, stated clerk of the Presbyterian Church who is secretary of the group and who toured the world as chairman of the general commission on army and navy chaplains, urged churches "to set in motion in the Orient the reconstruction forces, which will strengthen native elements of the Christian Church." A large portion of the Presbyterian restoration fund of $27,000,000 will be used in the Orient, he said.

Commission on Matrimony

(v) The bishop or ecclesiastical authority in such case, may in his discretion defer his judgment until receipt of the opinion of the commission on holy matrimony.

(vi) There shall be a permanent commission on holy matrimony of this Church appointed triennially by the Presiding Bishop by and with the advice and consent of the House of Bishops and consisting of three presbyters and two laymen, learned in the canon law, who shall hold office for three years and be eligible for reappointment.

(vii) The commission on holy matrimony, upon receipt of the record in any application as provided in subdivision (iv) hereof, shall review the same and render its opinion in writing to the bishop or ecclesiastical authority.

(viii) Each opinion of the commission on holy matrimony rendered under this canon by the commission shall be printed, omitting the names of the applicant and all other parties and witnesses, and a copy sent to the bishop or ecclesiastical authority of each diocese and missionary district.

(ix) The bishop or ecclesiastical authority shall take care that his judgment is based upon and conforms to the doctrine of this Church, that marriage is a physical, spiritual and mystical union of a man and woman created by their mutual consent of heart, mind, and will thereto and is lifelong; but when facts are shown to exist or to have existed which manifestly establish that no marriage bond as the same is recognized by this Church exists, the same may be declared by proper authority.

(x) Every judgment rendered under this canon shall be made a matter of permanent record in the archives of the diocese or missionary district.

(xi) Any person in whose favor a judgment has been granted under the provisions of this canon may be married by a minister of this Church.

III. Resolved, that canon 44 be amended by inserting the following sec. 2 (b) and the succeeding sub-sections be lettered accordingly: "Every minister in charge of a congregation shall give, or cause to be given, to both adults and children, regular instruction in the relation of the Church and the family; which instruction shall include the duties and responsibilities of membership in a family, the mutual obligations and privileges of spouses and of parents and children, and the Christian doctrine and discipline of marriage, together with the particular ministration of the word and sacraments and the work and worship of the Church of which the family and its members have need for the fulfilment of the Christian life."

IV. Resolved, that canon 44 be amended by inserting the following sec. 2 (c) and the succeeding sub-section be lettered (d) "Every minister in charge of a congregation shall, in exercising his pastoral ministry, take care to make the family a basic unit and objective of his effort."

V. Resolved, that canon 15, sec. 2, be amended to read as follows: "When a person to whom the sacraments of the Church shall have been refused, or who has been repelled from the holy communion under the rubrics, or who desires a judgment as to his status in the Church, shall lodge a complaint or application with the bishop, or ecclesiastical authority it shall be the duty of the bishop, unless he see fit to require the person to be admitted or restored because of the insufficiency of the cause assigned by the minister, to institute such an inquiry as may be directed by the canons of the diocese or missionary district, and should no such canon exist, the bishop or ecclesiastical authority shall proceed according to such principles of law and equity as will insure an impartial decision; but no minister of this Church shall be required to admit to the sacraments a person so refused or repelled, without the written direction of the bishop or ecclesiastical authority.

VI. Resolved, that canon 15 be amended by inserting the following new section 3 (a): "When marital unity is imperiled by dissension, it shall be the duty of either or both parties, before contemplating legal action, to lay the matter before a minister of this Church; and it shall be the duty of such minister to labor that the parties may be reconciled."

VII. Resolved, that since the matter is covered by resolution V the present section 3 of canon 15 be repealed.

VIII. Resolved, that this Convention recommends to the bishops and clergy of this Church that before solemnizing any marriage they require the parties thereto to sign the following statement signifying their understanding of the Church's doctrine regarding marriage and their intention to be faithful to it:

"We A.B. and C.D. desiring to receive the blessing of holy matrimony in the Church, do solemnly declare that we hold marriage to be a lifelong union of husband and wife as it is set forth in the form of solemnization of matrimony in the Book of Common Prayer. We believe it is for the purpose of mutual fellowship, encouragement, and understanding, for the procreation (if it may be) of children, and their physical and spiritual nurture, for the safeguarding and benefit of society. And we do engage ourselves, so far as in us lies, to make our utmost effort to establish this relationship and to seek God's help thereto."

IX. Resolved, that this Convention direct and it does hereby direct the National Council, through its departments of religious education, and Christian social relations, in co-operation with such other agencies as may be involved, and in consultation with the commission on holy matrimony, to prepare suitable guides for the preparation of persons for holy matrimony, offices of instruction on the nature of Christian marriage, the responsibilities and duties of family membership, and the doctrine and discipline of this Church in regard to holy matrimony, and to use every effort to obtain the use of such material in the parishes and missions of this Church.

BACKFIRE

Readers are encouraged to comment on editorials, articles and news. Since space is limited we ask that letters be brief. We reserve the right to abstract and to print only those we consider important.

VERY REV. JAMES M. MALLOCH
St. James Cathedral, Fresno, Calif.

I have read with great interest the review of Dr. Lowery's book The Trinity and Christian Devotion by Charles F. Hall in your issue of March 21st. I had been wondering when some Church paper would publish a sane and frank review of the book. Lowery's book simply is not good for its purpose. For the purposes of scholarship it would have been improved greatly by the inclusion of an index at least of the names quoted. One thing must be said very emphatically in favor of Dr. Lowery's effort, however. It really faces the mysterious problem of the Trinity in a philosophical manner, and unlike most books on doctrine appearing today, does not take the easy way out by making the doctrine of the Trinity easy to believe by reducing it to nothing.

PROF. VIDA D. SCUDDER
Wellesley, Massachusetts

May I pester Backfire once more? I want to say thank you for the editorial on the Epistle for Lent III. My mind echoes THE WITNESS daring answer to the question, "Where in our generation is the central battle forming?" We don't lack causes to support or evils to attack these days; but it happens that my chief interest in 1945 was focused in a conference on "The Christian Attitude toward Property," which was sponsored by some good theologians. Some day the public may have a chance to know what they thought. To my surprise, 1946 has forced the same subject on me, for it has brought me into unexpected contact with the Roman Catholic Franciscan Order, and led to renewed study of the stubborn and paradoxical struggle of the sons of the Poverello down long generations to the present day, to obey and implement their aversion to ownership, against the kindly efforts of Popes and Councils and the lure of their own sinful hearts persuading them to accept compromise. The friars have been perforce defeated; never have they wholly succumbed. Today, as we look anxiously toward Russia, and as we learn increasingly that Christanity has a bearing on corporate as well as individual living, is not the challenge they met confronted by us all? So your editorial implies. Tumultuous Franciscan history has unique implications for us in these critical and bewildering days.

REV. ELIOT WHITE
New York City

Please accept my sincere thanks for your timely and convincing editorials (March 28) against the appalling projected evil of an atomic bomb display of United States destructive potentialities — truly a tragic comedy. Your protest voices indignation and horror for us all superbly.

I believe you will pardon my adding expression of my surprise and near shock when at the end of the admirable fifth paragraph I came upon; "We will be right back where we started." Utterly impossible that that will, voicing the desire to be "right back," could be meant to annul all that the rest of the grand article advocates. The good, unflinching testimony of the editorial, that if we fail the world and the future now in this emergency, "We shall be right back where we started," was of course what was meant.

REV. JAMES F. ROOT
Windsor, New York

Nearly completing 25 years in the Church's Ministry in urban, rural, and institutional fields, I am in hearty accord with what the Rev. Massey H. Shepherd, Jr. has to say under the title "The Penitential Office," (WITNESS, March 4). During the period in which I have been privileged to serve the Church I have felt the need for some form of confessional printed in the Prayer Book to which penitents could turn as naturally as they do to any of the other offices provided to take care of their needs from the cradle to the grave. For it would seem natural that any penitent, who feels sufficiently so to come to his pastor in line with the Prayer Book exhortation on page 88 should feel that he can do this in a form officially recognized by his Church, wherein both his own and the Priest's parts are sufficiently indicated. Whatever the merits of the various forms used by the clergy, both penitent and priest would appreciate the benefit of an official form in the Book of Common Prayer which, next to the Bible, is our religious guide. Since there is an increasing number of people seeking such counsel, certainly all schools of thought within the Church would benefit by such a form since it would be optional, as are the present forms for unction, or the laying on of hands on the sick. Some use them and some do not, but if we want to use them, the directives are there, and people know about it.

Such formulary would be an invaluable bulwark and stay for young clergymen, whatever their training, sent out into parishes inexperienced in such matters, and would be an authoritative guide for such other clergy as are not perhaps in the habit of dealing with penitents in the sacramental manner.

REV. F. K. HOWARD
Berkeley, California

I want to express my delight over the editorials for the epistle and gospel for the Third Sunday in Lent (March 21). May I ask Massey Shepherd to write an article urging people to say "Amen" which I find they do not do as audibly as our forefathers did. Also could he explain how the psalter should be read, whether by alternate verses or by the minister and people splitting the verse which seems to be the custom in some congregations.

Thank you so much for the picture on the cover of March 21 and particularly its title. It gives a sense of renewed confidence in the Church. It makes possible sincerity in saying, "The Bishops! God bless them!"

MAKE A GIFT FOR EASTER

Many who have given generously to the great work being done in China under the direction of the Rev. Kimber Den have written to ask if there is still need, now that the war is over. The answer definitely is that the need is greater than ever—more children to take care of as well as adults—less to do with because of inflation.

Make it possible for us to send him another $1,000 at Easter. $15 will still clothe and feed a child for a month.

Bishop Urges Church to Lead Toward Better World

Bishop Scarlett Deals with Current Domestic And International Problems at Convention

By William Scarlett
The Bishop of Missouri

St. Louis.:—The last thirty years of human history have, I believe, hammered into the minds of a multitude of people the ever deeper conviction that Christianity offers the only solid ground on which to build a decent world: that Christianity is not something irrelevant to life, not something that touches only the fringes of life which we can take or leave as we please, but is in fact the very truth about man's relation to God and the universe, and man's relation to man. Only as the basic social and spiritual principles of high religion, stemming from the great Jewish Christian tradition, are applied in every area of life will the road to peace really open for mankind. This is our faith. This is what we believe. Here we take our stand. We can do no other.

There are, it seems to me, three hopeful movements in our world today in the direction of Christian goals. The Church should find herself at the very center of them, helping with all her power to accelerate and speed up these movements.

One is the movement toward world unity. The one clear gain of the war is this wider recognition of an ancient Christian principle: "we are members one of another; if one member suffers, all the members suffer with it; if one member is honored, all the members rejoice with it," that is, are benefitted by it. For we have shared together during the past six years some enormous experiences, illuminating experiences. Who can forget the shock of concern, of immediate personal concern, when we heard of the fall of the French Republic and realized how adversely this affected each one of us, himself and his family. At this moment we saw clearly how our fortune was united with the fortune of the people of another land. Who will ever forget England after Dunkirk, standing alone, with the fate of the future of civilization in her hands alone, standing like her own Gibraltar: "we shall fight them on the seas, on the shores, in the streets, in the fields." At that moment we realized that our security was bound up with the security of Britain, and we understood how essential it was to us that Britain be free, strong, prosperous. Whoever can forget the long days before Stalingrad when the Nazi tide threatened to cross the broad river, with what dire results to ourselves we could only dimly imagine. We realized then beyond a doubt that our fate, our future, was dependent on the heroic resistance of the Russian people pouring out blood and treasure unstintedly to dam that tide. These were moments of insight, moments on the mount, moments of vision in which even the blindest eyes caught some glimpse of the truth of the matter, even as the eyes of a blind girl in New Mexico many miles away caught a flash of light from the explosion of the first atomic bomb. These were great experiences which God was giving us to make us realize that our world is one, that humanity is one, that we must all live together or we shall all die together. We must cling to these experiences, remember them, treasure them, learn to think, make our decisions and act in their light. For this interdependence is as true in peace as in war; indeed, it is the neglect of this insight in peace which leads to war.

A good beginning of world organization has been made in the United Nations. It is the best which can be had at the moment. We must accept the discipline of the achievable, work with and through the United Nations, strengthen it and from this beginning push on as rapidly as is humanly possible toward real world government. The success of this great venture rests on the assumption that we really have learned the lesson of the last thirty years — that the world is one, that we are members one of another, that we must all work out together our common destiny on this small planet. To develop this sense of community, of world community, community toward all peoples in all lands, which must undergird any attempt to organize the world politically, is the function of the Christian Church. It is the function of every person who believes in his heart that mankind is one family under God. Let us not fail to play our full part in this terribly important crisis of world affairs.

Our sincerity and our wisdom in this new venture toward world community is being severely tested today in our relations with the people of Russia. We all recognize that only if these two giants of the twentieth century can cooperate and remain friends, is there any hope for the future; without it the years ahead are dark indeed. We all recognize that the path of cooperation is strewn with many difficulties, differences of points of view, the legacy of mutual suspicion. But the alternative to co-

★ How many clergymen we have placed in jobs through this department we do not know accurately. Funny thing about people; they write urgent letters asking us to find them a job but once placed through our efforts many of them do not even let us know so that we can turn our attention to others. Theologians have a name for it. Anyhow we do know of eight clergymen who have accepted positions through the efforts of this department. We have the names of good men on file who seek positions. But most of the jobs available are for curates. So if there are bishops or vestries that have parishes that are looking for men we will be glad to hear from them. operation with Russia is war, and this is unthinkable. And in view of the enormous peril of atomic warfare both nations must be prepared to make reasonable concessions.

It is here that a genuine religious faith may help to mitigate the tensions and suspicions of our modern world. It will rid us of any illusion of self righteousness, make us first scrupulously examine ourselves to be sure that our motives are good, our hands clean, our demands reasonable and our aims just. This is a contribution which the Church can make toward easing the tensions of Great States who simply must be friends.

It seems necessary to say, in view of the talk we hear, that deliberately to create suspicion of Russia or indirectly or directly to suggest war against Russia, in the name of religion, in the name of God, the all merciful father who maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust, is the very last insanity. It is not so that the purpose of high religion is furthered. It indicates also a basic lack of faith in the power of religion to make its own way, given a chance. It is being given more of a chance in Russia today. Let it grow.

A second stream flowing through our modern world, in which the Church should find herself at the very center, is the movement toward racial equality. One of the explicit premises of the United Nations in the recent war was its repudiation of Hitler's racial theories. This repudiation made a profound impact on the mind of the world, especially the Colored peoples of the world. It will not be forgotten. The word has gone forth; it cannot be recalled. It will not return unto God void. It must be made good.

And we people of America must begin with ourselves. Our immediate task is to establish, as rapidly as is humanly possible and as far as is humanly possible, equality of opportunity for all the people of our land; equality of opportunity in education, in training for skilled occupations, in securing jobs according to one's skill and not according to one's color, in health and housing conditions, in culture. This is something which no democracy which pretends to be a democracy and intends to remain a democracy can deny to one-tenth of its people.

More and more I am convinced that segregation is the great barrier to equality of opportunity. It is, for example, the obstacle in the way of equal opportunity in securing a college education, as the situation in many states indicates. Moreover, segregation is in itself an implication of inferiority, an inferiority not only of status but of essence, of being, and so contradicts the basic Christian principle of the dignity of every man as a child of God and the equality of all men in the sight of God.

I believe that the Church must lead in the attack on segregation. But to do so she must begin with herself. Discrimination within the Church of God because of race or color is a shocking thing. It is shocking because it cuts straight across a basic Christian principle. It is shocking because it reverses the historic nature of the Church which is a comprehensive fellowship of all believers. It is here, too, that a genuine religious faith will help to mitigate the tensions within our own country.

A third hopeful current running through our country today is the movement toward industrial democracy. Political democracy has less and less meaning if it is not accompanied by greater economic democracy. Since most of the workers' waking hours are spent at his job, and since this is the thing which concerns him and his family the most, it is altogether natural that he seeks to have more to say about that which is most vital to him. This is called "an encroachment on management" or "on the function of management." But this has always been the case since over a hundred years ago the workers first sought to have something to say about the physical conditions in which they worked. Today this is recognized as a matter of concern to them as, we might also add, in an inflationary day the matter of prices is a concern to us all. Moreover, beneath the struggle for better wages, better working conditions, more leisure, lies a deeper problem of society; the problem of giving every man status or sense of importance, a recognized place and a recognized function, the feeling that he belongs, is needed, is wanted and is a direct and useful contributor to the welfare of society. It is this which industry on the whole has failed to give its workers, though there are notable exceptions. Modern technique of mass production has achieved miracles in American industry but the problem of human engineering, the problem of human relations in industry lags far behind. Until industry has achieved the lever, until leadership on both sides has achieved the level, where the workers in industry can say "we," and not "they," the goal has not been approached.

It is here, too, that a genuine religious faith with its profound belief in the dignity and importance of every individual as an object of God's concern, and the individual's right to the fullest possible oppor-

More Democratic Foreign Policy Urged at Conference

Church Well Represented at Win-the-Peace Conference Which Is Very Largely Attended

By W. B. Spofford Jr.

Washington:—The immediate establishment of a more democratic and representative foreign policy by the United States, was urged by the nine hundred delegates attending the Win-the-Peace Conference held here, April 5-7. The Church was represented by delegates elected by the Methodist Federation for Social Service, the Church League for Industrial Democracy, the United Christian Council for Democracy, Social Action Council of the Congregational Church and the Presbyterian Fellowship for Social Action. There were large delegations from California, Oregon, Illinois, Massachusetts, Alabama, and other widely scattered states, making the conference truly representative of large numbers of organizations and individuals throughout the country.

For several weeks before the Conference convened, many newspapers, particularly the Hearst and Scripps-Howard chains, played it up as a "communist front." These papers had this inside dope from good authorities since they quoted John Rankin, Theodore Bilbo and Clare Hoffman to this effect. By and large, they helped immeasurably in making the congress an overwhelming success.

But, in spite of the attack, representatives were sent from practically all of this nation's leading liberal organizations: C.I.O., A..F. of L., National Citizens P.A.C., Religious Associates P.A.C., N.A.A.C.P., American Veterans Committee. Amvets, National Jewish Congress, Committee for American-Soviet Friendship and the several church organizations previously named.

During the three days, the congress heard dynamic speeches on foreign policy delivered by the fighting liberal wing of our national legislature and peoples' organizations. Among the speakers were Representatives John Coffee, Adolph Sabath, Ellis Patterson, Charles Savage, Hugh de Lacy; Senators Claude Pepper and Glen Taylor; R. J. Thomas, vice-president of the U.A.W.-C.I.O., Paul Robeson, Dr. J. Raymond Walsh, Russell Nixon, Millard Lampell, Mordecai Johnson, Dr. Max Yergan, Len De Caux, Mrs. Florence Eldredge March, Dr. Clark Foreman, Lee Pressman, Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, Edwin S. Smith, Dr. William Higginbotham and the Rev. Stephen Fritchman, who acted as chairman of the sessions.

Calling for a true de-Nazification and de-militarization program for both Germany and Italy, the Congress went on record in favor of civilian and international control of atomic energy; the breaking of relations with Fascist Spain; the recall of Herbert Hoover as food administrator in Europe; the true democratization, through free elections, of China, Greece and the Philippines; and the cessation of the formation of an Anglo-American bloc directed against the Soviet Union. Calling for the utmost support for the United Nations, the speakers decried the growing power of American imperialism abroad, carried on through the establishment of economic and industrial cartels with German, Japanese and British financiers and backed up by American bayonets, plus a shadow of the atomic bomb.

Realizing that democracy abroad must be based on democracy at home, the congress spoke in favor of a real full-employment program, the abolition of the poll tax, the establishment of a far-reaching housing policy and health policy and the continuation and vigorous enforcement of O.P.A. legislation.

A preliminary declaration of principles, which was passed with some modification of the wording, set the tone for the Win-The-Peace congress:

"Franklin Roosevelt looked to the future with confidence, seeing a world free from the scourge and terror of war for many generations. The Anglo - American - Soviet coalition, he helped to shape, has defeated fascism in battle. The peace he did not live to see is here. But already this war-racked generation is threatened with the scourge and terror of a third world war, preparation for which is well advanced."

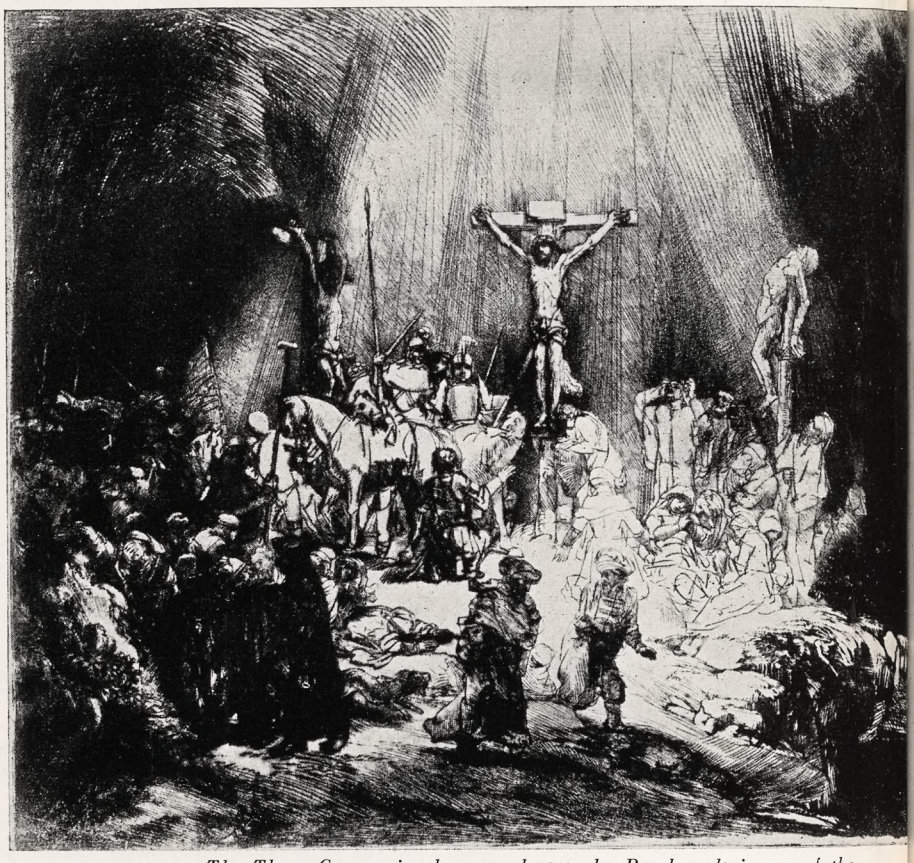
A notable feature of the congress was the dynamic and vocal role played by young, returning veterans, who passionately decried the roles that American troops and American finance were being forced to play abroad. Calling for an awakened American public, these men and women, with the flying eagle prominently displayed in the lapels of their coats, urged that the people of this country keep "their finger on the pulse of foreign policy and direct it towards world unity and brotherhood inistead of, as at present, down the road towards war and world atomization."

As one delegate summed up the conference to me, "if these people at this congress are all Reds . . . well, what is said here makes sense to me and there ought to be more people who think this way." Which, according to the people whom I spoke to at the sessions, was almost the unanimous sentiments of the delegates.

WASHINGTON CATHEDRAL TO HAVE SHRINE

Washington:—A national "shrine of each patriot's devotion," in memory of all Americans who lost their lives in the war will be added to the unfinished Washington Cathedral, it was announced on Palm Sunday by Dean John W. Suter. The shrine will be known as the war memorial chapel, according to the plan, and will occupy the west aisle of the incomplete south transept. This will hereafter be known as the patriots' transept, and will honor the service of all men and women of the armed forces in the recent and past wars.

The patriots' transept and the nave are the next portions on which construction will be resumed after funds are provided. When ready for use, these portions will increase the seating facilities to 7,000. Large congregations of 20,000, standing, will be accommodated. The total cost of the transept is estimated at $2,875,000. Preliminary work before the war, including foundations, was done with an expenditure of $375,000.



PROTESTANT BROADCAST IN POLAND

Geneva (wireless to RNS):—The first Protestant broadcast over a Polish radio station was made in connection with the recent dedication of a Methodist chapel in Warsaw, Werner T. Wickstrom, Chicago Methodist, revealed here. Wickstrom visited Poland as assistant director of the material aid division of the World Council of Churches. The Methodist leader said he himself took part in the program. The broadcast lasted two hours and was made possible by cooperation of the Polish government which placed its national radio facilities at the disposal of the Methodist congregation.

The Methodist chapel is located on the second floor of the former eight-story Methodist church in Warsaw which was destroyed during the war and is now being rebuilt. The 80,000 Methodists in Poland represent at present the nation's most active Protestant denomination, Mr. Wickstrom said.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE FOR VETERANS

Washington: — Bishop Sherrill of Massachusetts is one of the three religious leaders to be appointed on a committee to advise the veterans administration regarding its program to provide spiritual, recreational and other services to patients in hospitals and homes. The first meeting of the committee was held in New York on April 16. It is planned later to form committees in local communities.

The Three Crosses in the second state by Rembrandt is one of the most famous paintings in the Metropolitan Museum, New York

LELAND B. HENRY HEADS WORK

New York:—The Rev. Leland B. Henry became the executive director of the department of social relations in the diocese of New York on April 1. He served for three and a half years as an army chaplain, first as head of the chaplains school and later on a hospital ship both in the Atlantic and the Pacific. Before entering the service he was on the staff of St. George's, New York.

EDITORIALS

We, Too, Can Be Victorious

THE Resurrection of our Lord was more than his personal survival of death, more than the reward of the righteous, more than the revival of a dead body—like the revival of Jairus's daughter or the young man at Nain. Christ rose victorious from the dead; he has the power of an endless life; he brought life and immortality to light; he being raised from the dead dies no more, for death has no longer any power over him. All these New Testament phrases, and more could be cited, show what the Resurrection of Jesus meant to the earliest Christians. It was an event which transformed the world for them. It meant that life does not end in frustration and defeat, but in victory — because Christ has won the victory. They did not believe in what we call natural immortality, as a conviction based on speculation about the nature of existence or of the human soul. They were realists: if a man died, he was dead and gone—unless God kept him alive, or brought him back to life. It was only the philosophers who held ideas of the natural immortality of the soul. And so the Christians, who were not philosophers, for the most part, but uneducated people, and quite ordinary, saw that what they needed was a fresh power to keep men alive after death.

That power, the power of an endless life, they found in Christ. His life was one worth keeping alive forever. In union with him, a person could hope to share in this power, and so live forever. Therefore baptism; therefore eucharist, the food of eternal life; therefore prayer and grace and the whole effort of the Christian to live close to Christ and to lie down peacefully in him, at the last. Natural immortality might be true, or it might not—who can tell? But here was something that meant eternal life here and now, and promised life to come. To say the least, your chances of survival were better as a follower of Christ. The closer you lived to him, the surer you were of life to come, by sharing in his life, receiving his power, partaking of his spirit. That is the simple, direct realism of the classic age of our religion, the age that produced the New Testament. We wonder if Christians of the twentieth century are really any farther advanced, and can find any better ground of faith than those earliest Christians found:—Christ rose from the dead, victor over all its frustrations and defeats; in Christ, the Christian can share his life, his death, his victory. That is the heart of the message of Easter—not merely one man's victory (therefore, other men can perhaps win); or else, Christ proved the soul to be capable of survival (therefore, other men can perhaps survive); but rather: Christ rose victorious, and in him (and in him alone) we, too, can be victorious. Easter involves both Christ's victory and ours as well.

"QUOTES"

TO JESUS death is such a grim reality that he shrinks from it more than the ordinary man, but while it is the last enemy of man it can be overcome, and so he commends his spirit into his father's hands as one who confidently expects that God will overcome it. And the curious thing is that where men accept this view of things sincerely there is love, joy and peace. And the power of Jesus extends further than this. Not only did he promise his disciples that he would see them again but he convinced them that he did see them after his resurrection.

—Bishop Johnson

Of Mixed Marriages

MORE than twice as many marriages go on the rocks when one of the parties is a Protestant and the other a Roman Catholic as when both belong to the same faith. Indeed about one out of six such marriages is doomed to failure—almost as great a percentage as when there is no religious connection at all. Most of us are familiar with the fact that a Protestant who marries a Roman Catholic is asked, if he or she be married by a priest of the Roman Church, (in a "service", be it noted, which has no religious content) to sign a statement promising that all children of such union shall be baptized and educated in the Roman Church. Not everyone is aware that the Romanist partner is also required to bend every effort to convert the "heretical" member. Nor is it realized that if a Roman Catholic be married by a Protestant minister he or she is subject to excommunication.

These are only a few of the difficulties inherent in mixed marriages that are pointed out in an excellent little pamphlet, If I Marry a Roman Catholic published by the Federal Council of Churches. (5c a copy: 297 Fourth Avenue, New York 10, N.Y.)

That tensions will develop where there is not mutual respect for each other's religion is obvious.

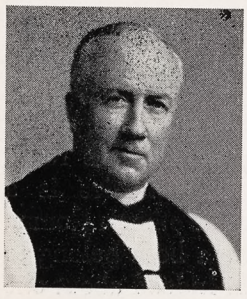
How can there be respect when the Romanist involved is taught to look upon the religion of the Protestant as false and invalid?



Our Church, with its respect for the sanctity of the individual, has never taken the obscurantist and intransigent position of the Roman Church. Perhaps it has been too lenient for the good of all concerned. Certainly it owes it to its constituents to advise them of the threat to happiness that lurks in mixed marriages. The pamphlet deserves wide circulation; especially is it splendid material for discussion in young people's groups.

Suggested Areas of Strategy

by Stephen E. Keeler

The Bishop of Minnesota

IN 1940 a joint commission of the General Convention on strategy and policy made a report at Kansas City, and had its recommendations been followed with enthusiasm the goals of our Reconstruction and Advance program, to mention only one of the major interests of the Church, might have been more easily reached. The outbreak of the war diverted the attention of the Church in other directions. It would be well for our Church to heed that report on strategy and policy as a basis for postwar effort, for it contained an effective statement on the theology of missions. I propose to quote from it briefly in this paper, for it is vitally fundamental in any strategy for the Church in any day.

We are weak as a missionary Church, not because we have tried our theology and found it wanting, but because we fail to grasp its tremendous implications. Our lips repeatedly recite the creeds without any honest and thoroughgoing response of mind and will. Many a Protestant body with a woefully defective theology has been far more effective in missionary zeal for their particular cult than we for the whole of catholic truth and teaching. "We believe in one God, the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible." So we say with our lips and deny with our racial prejudices, and vitiate with our inaction as we face the need of brethren of color and racial origins other than our own. For if God is a father of all mankind, all men are his loving concern, and we are brothers of all. If we believe that with all our life, as well as profess it with our lips, we Christians could force "one world" to become the primer of our political and economic effort.

"We believe in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only begotten son of God. . . . Who for us men and for our salvation came down from heaven. . . . Whose kingdom shall have no end." Here is the heart and center of the Christian faith. Where it is vivid and vital, missions flourish. Here are all the essentials to drive us forward in an effective strategy—the deity of our Lord, his divine purpose to save all men, his eternal kingdom. These essentials have been the core of the teaching of every effective missionary. They made the nineteenth century one of great missionary expansion. These planted the Church in the far-flung islands of the Pacific where many a grateful soldier, sailor and airman found it embedded in the lives of friendly natives. Because of the eternity of Jesus Christ, they must become the real conviction of a thoroughly converted priesthood and laity if we are to become, and to continue, a truly great missionary Church.

"We believe in the Holy Ghost . . . one catholic and apostolic Church. . ." The ministry of the Holy Spirit is to lead us in an ever-growing knowledge of what is truly catholic and apostolic. If we have a truly catholic outlook we must believe that the Church is the body of Christ and destined to embrace all men. To remember its apostolic character and practice is to believe in its missionary purpose and objective. We shall become as zealous for evangelistic effort as for the emphasis on sacramental teaching. For indeed evangelism has as much to do with true catholicism as does sacramentalism. We will remember that the great emphasis in the gospels and epistles is evangelistic. We must attract and capture the attention of men before we can feed them with sacramental grace. Our greatest effort will be "in the highways and byways, compelling them to come into our Father's house," where hungry souls, yes, and bodies too, may be fed with all the grace of the Saviour's "sufficient sacrifice."

Wherever we have these great central truths thoroughly alive in the hearts of believers, we have a victorious Christianity and an expanding Church. While the proclamation of these great truths has always been the primary task of every minister of the Church, still a careful observation of the life and the work of the average parish will reveal how little they are the constant concern of the pulpit and the pew. All too seldom are the laity called upon to remember that all they say they believe in the creeds is missionary in its essence. If but a quarter of the 1,568,152 recorded communicants of our Church really lived the missionary implications of the creed, the goal of $8,500,000 of the Reconstruction and Advance Fund would have been easily achieved. The sorry fact that we have not reached the goal should move us to see the importance of a great renewal in our evangelistic effort on the part of both clergy and people. This is fundamental in any strategy for true progress of the Church. Evangelism is the art of living the Christian life in such a fashion that it compels the attention of other people and moves them to respond. It is not primarily a matter of preaching, but always a matter of living. It is a Way of Life that counts. "What you are speaks so loudly that I cannot hear what you say."

An effective evangelist is always a converted man. There is a chapter in Bishop Carey's little book, My Priesthood, which seriously indicts the clergy, insisting that too few of them are thoroughly converted men. Again, I am reminded that the late Archbishop Temple, in his little book, Personal Religion and the Life of Fellowship has a chapter entitled The Primary Need—Conversion. Think of it! The primary need of the Church a converted priesthood! Yes, it is so. A converted man is one turned wholly Godward. The moment our people sense that to be true, they gladly follow, for nothing more effectively wins their allegiance. A fully converted man is always a missionary. In these United States there are 140,000,000 people. It is estimated that only half of these have a relationship to any organized Christian body. Who can deny the prime importance of seeking for these who at least are indifferent to, if not actually lost to, the fellowship of "His Body."

As I reflect on these things, I am moved to ask God to forgive me for the time I have spent in "saving the saved." How much of the effort in every parish on the part of priest and people is among those who "already belong." How little we concern ourselves with those who are without. To read a page of the gospel is to discover that it is a gospel for the lost and that the strategy and emphasis of Jesus was constantly in that direction. When we act as though we know that to be the case, and use our imagination in plans and programs to reach these many souls, we too shall move as Christian strategists.

Another major need in strategy lies in the field of the religious education of the children and youth of the Church. Our concern in this all-important area leaves much to be desired. The statistics of the last few decades are not pleasant reading. The observance of the programs for education, the leadership available for it, and the money invested in it does not indicate strategy on the part of the clergy and vestries of our churches. Rome on the one hand, and most Protestant sects on the other, have left us far behind in the matter of emphasizing the training of the young in their respective communions. In the past twenty-five years there has been an almost steady decline in the number of children and teachers in our church schools. The figures show 2600 fewer teachers in our Sunday schools and 50,000 fewer pupils in 1946 than we had in 1922. It is easy to criticize the National Council and to say that our department of religious education is responsible for it all. The fault really lies in the indifference of most of the clergy and vestries of our parishes for any enthusiasm or concern for the training of the children. If the parish leaders who have honestly exhausted every help available from our department of religious education and other resources to reach the situation, were to cast the first stone, not many would be thrown. An awakening on the part of clergy and lay leaders to the tragedy ahead because of the spiritual and religious illiteracy of the youth of our congregations, is the first step in correcting the situation. Overhauling the curriculums of our seminaries and doing a thorough job in training seminarians in methods and programs of religious education, would probably be more effective than the emphasis in other areas of seminary teaching. Every bishop watching young men in their first years in parish life and work is all too aware of the inadequacy of their preparation when it comes to teaching religious truth.

IN THE missionary area of our domestic field, I push the claims for strategy in three directions if we are really to meet important opportunities which lie at our very door.

The time is at hand for us to consider ways and means for the more effective ministry of our Church in the university and college centers. Here certainly is a need for strategy. Christianity will never again be as strong as it should be until the Church has gained a more sincere allegiance from the educated and professional classes. We have been far too ready to assume that they are outside the scope of its ministry. Such a policy is suicidal. A terrible nemesis awaits for any Church which neglects its ministry to the universities. The close relation of the Church and colleges was in the early days one of the most profound influences in our national life and religion. The recent growth of great state universities, with official relationship to any one religious body ruled out by charter provisions, has in some ways aggravated our problem, but in others it presents us a unique opportunity.

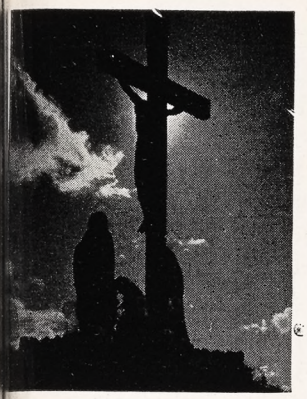
At its great peril will any Church neglect the student class! After all, the whole of the next generation will have its attitudes to life moulded by the men and women who are today in the colleges. We are committed to the importance of placing our picked men in our college centers. Students are a special constituency and their needs are not satisfactorily provided by the ordinary parochial machinery. Yet, there is nothing which will count more in providing a Christian leadership in the parishes as well as in education, and in public life. There is no class with a stronger claim on Christians than the due endowment of ministries to students. The budget of our National Council for the division of college work is roughly $43,000. In contrast to this, the Lutherans have budgets of several hundred thousand dollars. Other religious bodies are spending money in comparable degree and great results come to them.

Our responsibility for the Negro constitutes as strong a challenge to our domestic missionary emphasis as anything I know. The American Church Institute for Negroes should engage the generous attention and loyalty of our Church. Its work among the nine Institute schools in the South is one of emphasis upon training the leadership for the Negro race. They are all founded to emphasize normal and industrial training and in preparing Negro men for the ministry and Negro women as nurses. They are to receive $700,000 from the Reconstruction and Advance Fund. No money will be more wisely spent than this which we devote to strengthening these schools so carefully managed by the American Church Institute for Negroes. The democracy which demands the service of Negroes to defend it in war, if consistent, will be a democracy which gives the Negro an opportunity for industrial and economic growth. We must always remember that the Negro is not in this country because he chose to come here. We once thought him necessary for the economic development of a large area of our national life. His needs should make an appeal to every Christian who believes in justice and fair play, and a part of our strategy in the years that lie ahead should be the thorough preparation of the leadership of the Negro race, and then the fair opportunity for the employment of that leadership.

John Morley, the English statesman, and a very careful observer of American life of twenty years ago, made a second visit to the States in the second administration of the first Roosevelt. As he was returning home he was met at the dock by reporters, who asked him what had impressed him most in America. He replied at once, "Niagara Falls, Theodore Roosevelt and the Negro problem." The reporters understood, of course, Niagara Falls and Roosevelt, but questioned him for some further light on the Negro problem. He replied, "You Americans think England has something in Ireland that she cannot handle, but it is as nothing compared with the problem that confronts Americans unless you solve the economic and industrial status of the Negro."



The work of the Church in rural America constitutes a most challenging opportunity. Here again we have only touched the fringes of our responsibility. An adequate budget for our rural work, and under strong leadership, would produce results little realized at present. An intelligent approach to our small town, village and rural opportunity would react very favorably on the Church in larger centers. The Roman Catholic Church well understands this, and through the national Catholic rural life conference is pushing the influence of the Roman Church into the neglected areas of rural population.

It is true that 85% of our communicants live in city parishes, which leaves only 15% as our membership in rural communities. These figures become important when we realize that the population of the nation is about equally divided between city and country. Then when we remember that 60% of the people who live in rural America are not related to any organized Church work, we can see what a field awaits our effort in this respect. The General Convention will have a report of its joint commission on rural work and it is to be earnestly hoped that something more than general commendation will be given it. It really should become one of our major lines of interest and strategy.

These three lines of missionary advance—(1) through our ministry to students in university and college centers; (2) through our vigorous support of work among Negroes in our larger centers of Negro population, and especially the American Church Institute for Negroes; (3) through the challenge of rural America,—constitute lines of strategy which the division of domestic missions must vigorously promote.

The Cross:

A SIMPLE THING

By

DOUGLAS SAMPSON

The cross?
Well, it's a very simple thing .
Very simple:
One part above, two parts below
And then a cross-bar
Tied on with hemp
Or hammered with nails.
Simple, isn't it?
Why you could make one
Or you
Or you.

* * * *

The wood began with a lonely seed
Blown by the weed or carried by bee:
Pollen from stamens placed on the pistil . . .
Beginning of birth,
Spark of its life.

Next came water and nitrogen cycle,
Down went the roots into darkness of earth,
Up went the trunk to blueness of sky,
Leaves in the breeze and
Rain at the base.

Packed in the form is the story of time;
Creation was started and molded like this,
Shapes of eternity prisoned in space:
This is the past
And today and tomorrow.

Axe at the trunk, eating the heart;
Strokes hammer home with sharpness of death.
One look at the sky and feel of the wind . . .
Then falling through space
Like an angel from heaven.

Next comes the plane and leveller and knife,
Gone are the branches, the bark and the root,
Cut from the earth where it flourished so well;
Now it's a pole . . .
Naked and stark.

Now cut it in two, not at the half . . .
Dimensions? One to three seems about right.
Put them aside; we've lots more to do.
They won't go away,
They're robbed of all life.

* * * * *

Now we need something to get them together.
Rope or sharp nails; either will do.
Let us try nails, they hold much better . . .
Biting and grasping,
They're tough as humanity.

Down in the depths, the bowels of the earth,
Molecular changes fashion the stuff . . .
Chemical laws with a pinch of the physical:
Leave it to harden
Trillions of years.

This is your stuff; the tool of your craft.
Send down some men with picks and jack-hammers,
Give them good muscles and the power to sweat . . .
Time has toiled well,
The iron is solid.

Raise to the surface and give it the flame,
Temper it hard with the hotness of hell;
Ship it in strips, shiny as glass . . .
Cut it to shape,
A head and a point.

* * * * *

Take the two poles and put them together:
Tall on the vertical; short, horizontal.
Take up the nail, place at junction of matter,
Now hammer with vigor:
The result is a cross.

* * * * *

You say it looks bare? Well, maybe you're right,
It does look lonely standing so stark:
But this will be harder, not done in a day,
Because added to matter
Is something called spirit.

Dig deep in a swamp, jump down in the ooze:
Come up with a cell and give it some life . . .
Then let it be in all sorts of places,
Water and the sky and
The face of the earth.

Then watch it develop in all sorts of ways . . .
Always dividing, it varies its shape:
Fins, wings, hair and something called man . . .
This last is the highest:
An image of God.

* * * * *

A will that is free and fully creative;
A mind that is brilliant and sharp to observe;
A soul that's dependent, lost all alone:
A creature of moods . . .
The great and the low.

* * * * *

Will this thing do? Does it fit your scheme?
Shall we take just one — or place them all on?
Or is the one all, a symbol of truth?
Pick your man well,
We want no mistake.

Let's canvass the field, all sorts and conditions:
Some are too silly and others too wicked.
They wouldn't lend balance; they couldn't do . . .
Look a bit further,
We're bound to succeed.

You find one is innocent, free of all taint?
His history is perfect? He hasn't a blot?
A lad from the country who doesn't know sin?
Yes, he will do . . .
Quick, let's hammer him on.

* * * * *

Yes, he will pass on, but he does give it balance:
Now it looks right, sort of full and complete.
See — his head to the side, spittle of red.
What's wrong with it now?
You say he's not dead?

Do his eyes stare forth with a light of peace:
Does his frame hold something, all that can be?
Can it be history? The meaning of things?
Now don't get frightened . . .
He's perfectly harmless.

* * * * *

Well, there is your cross and a job well done.
It's made to last; it won't fall down.
Look where you will and there it will be . . .
Standing straight up
Through ages to come.

Look over there. See, it's the cross
Mirrored in eyes that gaze at the sky . . .
Eyes that are slanted and tortured with pain:

That is the cross
Set in Yenan.

Or again over here — framed in the dirt:
Pictured is something that is awful to see . . .
A portrait in brown with a mixture of red:
A trembling body
On a street in Detroit.

And this, too, is the cross and it's witness to truth . . .
Filthy, yes, but shining with powerful light
That knifes through the darkness to those who hope:
A cell in Madrid . . .
A soldier in Spain.

And turn over there to that girl in her pain . . .
See, her eyes hold water, not living but dead.
That is your cross with its message so clear:
Gas-chambers go well
With a six-pointed star.

Or look to the country and the freckled-faced kid:
Barefoot, yes, with straw hat and blue jeans . . .
But, likewise, with rickets and pains in his belly.
Share-croppers and Okies:
Again it's the cross.

Now move to the city and a busy street corner,
A man all alone cursing his fate . . .
Let's call him a veteran who couldn't get work,
Medals plus hunger
Add up to the cross.

Or look to the smallest, the tiniest speck:
Some neutrons and protons in regular pattern,
Give them the works and give them a shell
And float down from the skies:
A cross mixed with hell.

* * * * *

But mixed with your poison is fruit that is ripe . . .
Filled with justice and peace and something called love.
You built the whole thing and created it well:
And Another worked too
And kidnapped your plan.

A boy from the country who is hung on a cross,
A crown on his head and a wound in his side,
Defeated but with power for all who can see:
"To find true life,
Come ye unto me."

The fruit of the good is outnumbered, it's true . . .
But it grows very well and should hold its own:
Chungking defiance and Spain with a hope
Prayer in Detroit and Fighting in Lwow.

Men clasping hands and marching together
Singing and working and building a world . . .
Self-evident truths are burning their souls,
Burned by the cross
Which rules over time.

Down on their knees, they challenge the world;
Their sign of defeat is a symbol of triumph . . .
Or discipline, conviction and consecrated power . . .
A living communion
To upset the world.

You built up a monster and worshipped the false:
You crucified goodness and laughed at its pain;
You turned down the hill and sought other ends;
But there it is always Seeking its own.

The cross?
Well, it's a simple thing . . .
Very simple:
One part above, two parts below
And then a cross-bar
Tied on with hemp
Or hammered with nails.
Simple, isn't it?
Why you could make one
Or you
Or you . . .

Where Are the Dead?

By
HUGH D. McCANDLESS
Of THE WITNESS Editorial Board

TO MANY who have beloved friends or kin who have passed from this life, there is an unworded question about the sort of life those people are living now. Where are they? Do they sleep, waiting for a final judgment? Do they know what is happening to us? Will we know them and will they know us when we, too, leave this world?

This article will not deal with the question of the reasonableness of belief in an after-life, but with the problem of trying to picture it to ourselves. For those who wonder if the dead still exist at all, perhaps the best book to recommend would be Immortality, by Frederick C. Grant.

Sometimes the vagueness of our knowledge makes us picture the future life as a kind of Sheol, like that which was in the minds of some of the Old Testament writers, or like Hades, which the Greeks thought of as the condition of the dead. The state of the dead in both these cases was imagined to be a misty, shadowy, dull sort of half-existence. It was a lower form of life, as far as intensive living was concerned, than world life, and the classic writers describe those in Hades as saying that the lowest slave on earth was more fortunate than the greatest King in Hades.

This is, of course, not true. Any scientist who thinks as well as investigates will tell you that the obvious purpose of life on this planet is the intensification of life. The history of plant and animal life on the earth shows us the gradual growth of that life—always to something more alive. You are more alive than a cabbage or an amoeba or even than a cow because you have added to physical life the freedom of the mind, and the still greater freedom of choice which proves that you are something more than flesh and blood conditioned by heredity and environment.

It is obvious that the more mental and spiritual life becomes, the more alive it is. Thus life after death, with its elimination of physical handicaps, is a state in which we shall be more alive than we are now. Putting off the body will be like putting off a strait-jacket; losing the eyes of flesh will be like losing blinders.

It is difficult for us to imagine being "more alive" than we are now. A man takes his dog for a walk, to call on friends. "This is the life" thinks the dog, as he races back and forth around his master. When they arrive at their destination, the dog thinks the ensuing hour of mere talk is dull indeed. He cannot understand how this human yapping can mean more to these people than a good run. But we can realize that life without physical thrills, chills, spills, and ills, can be just as exciting—just as lively—as life with them.

Attempts to get definite about the after-life are often left to poets whom we recognize as having a unique grasp of truth. The trouble is that we, too, often forget that their work is poetry and not blue prints. The starving prisoner in a labor concentration camp who wrote Revelation must be rather startled to know how people have made a combination floor plan and time chart out of his great poem. The picture of heaven we get from the hymns, if we pin them down too closely, is one which would repel anyone who was tone-deaf or disliked church music. We like short services of worship, and when we make the poetry of the after-life our Baedecker's guide to heaven, we are faced by an endless Sabbath, which probably would be as appalling to God as it is to us. He no doubt has other things to do besides listen to interminable alleluias. What the poets are trying to tell us is that every act in heaven is a perfect act because it is perfect worship; because in the after life we shall know the word of God as we can only guess it here.

Another picture is that of purgatory. This is valuable for the truth it contains that there will be growth after death so that our imperfections may be overcome. It ceases to be a truth when purgatory becomes a place; a place where God purifies with punishment, rather than educates with love.

The Prayer Book doesn't give us a consistent doctrine about the condition of the dead. In one place (p. 75) we pray for their continual growth; in another (p. 330) we read that we shall be "changed at the last trump"; in another we pray that the dead may continually increase in knowledge and service; in another (p. 337) we declare that the earth and sea shall some day give up their dead.

The Church has not spoken in a definite way about that bourne from which no traveller has returned. It gives us a rich picture without trying to be logical. Therefore, you and I can make our best and most satisfying picture about where the dead are and how they are as the Holy Spirit may direct us; we can feel that if that picture is not true, it is only because it is incompletely true; because the fruition of God's love passes all that earth-bound humanity can desire or deserve.

THIS picture need not be at all vague or unattractive. We have many clues to the future in our own past. As we have grown in our own lives, as the human race has developed in what we know of its history, as life itself has developed from the simplicity of the one-celled animal up through the vertebrates and mammals to man,—lines have been drawn which enable us to plot our future growth in personality or spirit.

Perhaps the most satisfying over-all view is that given in W. Cosby Bell's classic If a Man Die (Scribner's). Dr. Bell clearly shows that life after death will not be alien or strange to those who have lived the life in the world; that it will concede nothing to earthly life in reality, personal living, usefulness, and anything else that makes life worth living. I once described the vigorous charm of this book to an impertinent young relative; he volunteered to bring me the kitchen knife in case I could not wait to taste the experiences it forecasted. However, this book is not one to make one love life less, because he loves heaven more; it makes the two grandly synonymous.

Perhaps the best hint most of us can have about life in the spirit is gained at holy communion. What happens when we receive the sacrament is a mystery to us, and yet it is an experience too real to deny. For a moment, we are above time and space. We touch eternity; we are consciously near our Lord. And yet we do not lose our own personalities, our own self consciousness, at that moment. We are aware of other personalities, living and "dead", and there is no gulf between us and them. We are not sleeping, nor in a trance, and yet we are having an experience that has nothing to do with our flesh.

Eternal life, what our Lord called "life indeed", can happen here and now. At times of great inspiration, or when making deep moral decisions, we all feel that we are breathing the winds of heaven. These are the most vital, wide awake, and thrilling experiences we have. They are the most unforgettable, whereas experiences based on material or outside circumstances are often impossible to recapture. These experiences are often enjoyed in spite of physical circumstances. Surely they are a foretaste of purely spiritual life. It is unreasonable to imagine that the quality of living now experienced by those we call "dead" is in any way less vital, conscious, or exciting.

Churches Vigorously Affected By Impact of the War

Religion Deepened in Europe but Speaker Thinks the Anglican Church Is Challenged

Edited by Sara Dill

Sewanee, Tenn.: — American Protestantism has not experienced any great transformation as a result of the war. On the European continent, however, the religious life of the Churches was immeasurably deepened, whereas in England Christianity is on trial, particularly Anglican traditionalism. These were the conclusions drawn by Dr. Wilhelm Pauck, professor of historical theology at the University of Chicago, in an address delivered on April 4th at the theological seminary of the University of the South.

Dr. Pauck's main emphasis was on the effect of the war upon the theological conversations of the future between European and American Protestants. The war, he said, has had little effect upon American Protestantism, in terms of enriching and deepening the spiritual life of the Protestant churches. American Protestantism has not experienced any great transformation as a result of the impact of the war. American Protestants, generally, are not even greatly perturbed, for example, over the critical situation of our economic structure. The dominant attitude apparently is that the modern time can be regarded simply as a projection of the pre-war status.

In Great Britain, Dr. Pauck stated, Christianity has lost ground during the war. Organized Christianity has receded more and more from public life. There is a growing attitude of regarding Christianity as a minority group, and the social outlook of the Churches is increasingly radical. The deaths of Archbishop Temple and Dr. Paton removed prominent leaders, and no successors have yet emerged. Christianity is on trial in Great Britain — particularly Anglican traditionalism.

On the European continent, however, the religious life of the Churches was immeasurably deepened by the war, despite the decimation of the physical means of leading the religious life. The resistance of the German Confessional Church to the Nazis set the pattern for European Protestantism generally. The Protestants in Europe came to be aware with fervor of their distinctive property as Christians. They consciously set themselves in contrast to their environment.

The Barthian neo-orthodox group came to be of the greatest theological and practical importance. This group is characterized by a threefold emphasis. First, this group emphasizes the difference of the Church from other social organizations or groups. "The Church is the Church" is a very important expression of this attitude. Second, this group emphasizes a strong Biblicism. The view is that there can be no Christian life except it be under the infallible guidance of the Bible. The Bible is not to be read merely historically, but it is to be read religiously and theologically because the Church has made it its canon. The Bible belongs to the Church. Third, this group emphasizes a rigorous Christocentricity. Christ is the king of all that exists, the lord before whose tribunal everything will be judged and measured. From this outlook, a strong eschatological emphasis has developed.

American Protestantism, in forthcoming ecumenical conferences, will encounter the European Protestants and their claims. American Protestantism has been moving very haltingly and gingerly in the direction of ecumenicity: European Protestantism has emerged from the war with a profound and urgent sense of calling. A "Christocentrically read Bible" gives European Protestantism a definitive universe of discourse greater than anything to be found in American Protestantism.

A great burden of spiritual deepening, therefore, lies on American Protestantism if ecumenical progress is not to be disrupted by the disparity which the war has brought about between American and European Protestantism.

Aid Europeans

New York: — The Church's part in the material aid program for Europe and Asia is being taken with enthusiasm and shipments of needed supplies gathered by Church people are going out constantly from the United Church Service Centers. In the month of March nineteen dioceses sent shipments, varying from one box to thirty-seven boxes, the month's high mark set by the Woman's Auxiliary of St. Peter's Church, Albany, N. Y. In the nineteen dioceses, thirty-three parishes, parish organizations or individuals, sent shipments. A number were from Woman's Auxiliary branches, and the Girls' Friendly Society is well represented.

Omit Flowers

Buffalo: — An old Easter custom will be omitted for the first time this year in Trinity Church, one of the city's largest churches. Instead of decorating the altar with flowers, given by parishioners in memory of the dead, their donations will be used to aid war victims in Europe and Asia. The vestry of the church has concurred in the opinion of the Rev. William Thomas Heath, rector, that "it would be inappropriate to spend money for flowers" because of "the great need of living people in Europe. We are, therefore, suggesting to our people that the money received for memorials this year be given for the relief of our Christian brethren in war-torn places of the world," said Mr. Heath. "This, we feel, is a truly fitting way in which to pay our tribute of devotion in such times as these in which we are living."

No Property Losses

New York: — Bishop Harry S. Kennedy of the Hawaiian Islands cabled headquarters on April 8: "No church property losses in tidal wave. Twenty-four Hilo church families homeless. Everything lost. Other islands, similar condition. Everyone trying to dig out of the terrible devastation."

not they are "undesirable personnel," appointment of Toyohiko Kagawa, Christian leader whose name was submitted by the Japanese government, is being delayed. An associate of Kagawa explained the delay is due to Kagawa's failing to submit a questionnaire in compliance with earlier SCAP directives. "Dr. Kagawa was not aware of the requirement." said the associate.

One Class Churches

Philadelphia (RNS):—A plea to ministers of the Presbyterian Church to make that denomination more representative of all economic classes is contained in Monday Morning, Presbyterian weekly circulated among its pastors. Querying the pastors, "Is your church Catholic?" Prof. Elmer G. Homrighausen of Princeton Theological Seminary, chairman of the research committee of the national commission on evangelism of the Church, warned against the tendency of Presbyterian churches to cut themselves off "from the common man." This tendency has resulted, he said, in the development "of a single class of Christian fellowship" which ceases to be catholic and inclusive of all men.

Prof. Homrighausen said Presbyterianism has attracted the educated and more privileged because it always has emphasized stewardship and education.

"The Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A.," he asserted, "has the tendency to be directed in its judicatories by commissioners largely drawn from the upper or middle classes. Greater care needs to be exercised that commissioners of all types of churches and classes represent the church."

According to statistics quoted by Prof. Homrighausen, "the Presbyterian Church has proportionately over three times as many people of the upper income status in its constituency as the Roman Catholic Church, and the Protestant Episcopal Church four times as many as the Roman Catholic.

"Protestantism either thrives on education and better economic status, or it produces better educated and prosperous communities. Apparently, it takes money and education to keep Protestantism alive!"

Deny War Guilt

Frankfurt, Germany (wireless to RNS):—An estimated eighty per cent of Germans are opposed to the declaration adopted by the Evangelical Church of Germany at Stuttgart last fall acknowledging the Church's share in Germany's war guilt, according to Hans Werner Jensen, assistant general secretary. He said the percentage of opposition among churches, however, is about fifty per cent. Jensen said his office has already answered 700 letters dealing with the question of German war guilt. He revealed that forty per cent of the writers openly condemned the Stuttgart statement, while another forty per cent questioned the form of the statement. Only 20 per cent were entirely in favor of the declaration.

Christian Youth

New York (RNS):—The second world conference of Christian Youth will be held in Europe next year, the American committee for the World Council of Churches announced here. A definite site has not as yet been selected for the meeting, but a planning conference will assemble at Geneva July 10-15 to map details for the 1947 conference.

The first world conference was held at Amsterdam in 1939.

Joins Council

Geneva (wireless to RNS):—The Evangelical Church of Slovakia has joined the World Council of Churches, it was announced at Council headquarters here. The Council now numbers 93 Protestant and Orthodox churches in 33 countries. Comprising 400,000 Lutherans, the Slovak Church was persecuted during the Nazi occupation of Slovakia. Many pastors were imprisoned, state support was withdrawn from the Church, and its publishing society was closed down.

Warning to Cardinals

Paris (wireless to RNS):—A manifesto issued by the Cardinals and Archbishops of France declaring they will continue their fight to have liberty of education inscribed in the new French constitution, has drawn fire from Andre Stibio, well-known columnist. Describing the hierarchy's stand as "ill-timed," Stibio wrote in L'Ordre that the prelates' manifesto "comes at a moment when the spirit of conciliation has been shown by anti-clericals, a spirit which should reassure the cardinals and archbishops of France regarding the supposed danger to church schools. It is not very far-sighted of the cardinals to minimize concessions which the Communists and Socialists have made in an effort to prevent division in the nation," he declared.

Maurice Schumann, leader of the Popular Republican Movement, stated that the two left wing parties, which have a sufficient majority to impose their wishes, could have written into the constitution a concrete threat to liberty of education, but chose merely to refuse to inscribe it as an essential right. Schumann said that although suppression of church schools would have given the leftist groups a good election

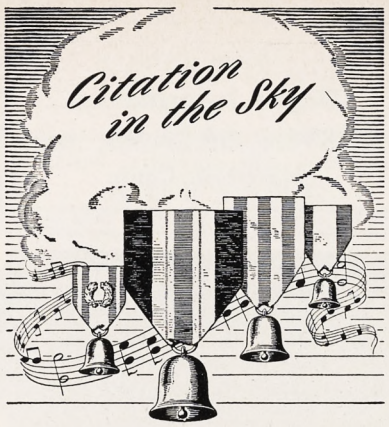
Send Heifers



Boston:—The cathedral here has already sent twenty-six heifers to Europe to help replenish the devastated herds, according to Dean van Etten. The congregation is participating in the United Church Service Centers project to send 200,000 so that European children may soon have milk. Some people have given $125, the cost of one animal; others have given $1 for a heifer's tooth or tail, with the various donations finally adding up to a healthy animal. UNRRA pays the freight and makes the necessary arrangements; volunteer "cattlemen" go with each shipment, with applications for the job now being received, but it is the United Church Service Center that arranges for the purchases.

Large Donation

Cincinnati:—The Rev. Nelson M. Burroughs interrupted the service just before the regular offering on April 7 at Christ Church to announce that $63,000 had been pledged to the R. & A. fund. This is $3,000 over the pledge. Two unusual features marked the campaign. Returned servicemen were given the responsibility of conducting it, with twenty young men and women acting as captains, with Palmer H. Beam, navy; Otis R. Hess, army, and Theodore D. Truesdell, marine, the chief officers. Their efforts were headed up in a dinner, attended by 600, at which veterans spoke. Also speaking were Chaplain Harold C. Gosnell of Lincoln, Neb., of the seabees, and Bishop Henry W. Hobson. The other feature was that all of the 579 pledges were voluntary, with no one asked for specific amounts and no solicitors calling on special givers.

Services for Seamen

New York: — Special noonday services for seamen of all nationalities were held last week and Holy Week at the Seamen's Church Institute. Preachers were New York clergymen: Roscoe T. Foust of the Ascension; Hugh D. McCandless of the Epiphany; Shelton H. Bishop of St. Philip's; Harold J. Weaver of Grace; Irving S. Pollack of St. Bartholomew's; Ernest A. Harding of Messiah, Brooklyn; Lesley Wilder Jr. of St. Thomas'; Canon Thomas A. Sparks of the Cathedral and Bishop Charles K. Gilbert. Director Harold H. Kelley officiated.

CARILLONIC BELLS

Remember, not in the silence of sorrow, but in ringing, faith-filled music, those who have put on, so young, the shining investiture of immortality. Let Carillonic Bells ring out for them, stirring the air in music as golden and triumphant as the youth they wear unfading. Let bells sing their valor through the lanes and fields they knew, the streets they walked, the homes they loved, to the listening hearts of those who loved them. From any tower or building, the glowing tones of Schulmerich Carillonic Bells can sing their memorial, day after day, in a tribute ever new, with an inspiration never old.

No finer memorial bells can be chosen than those constructed by Schulmerich electronic engineers. They are convenient to install, requiring no additional structure, modernly compact in size and cost. Carillonic Bells are the master-result of a quarter century of electronic science. Radiantly clear, the tones blend from deep-throated beauty to a delicate, high purity. The full sweetness of their tone far surpasses any other chimes or bells made.

If you would like to have Carillonic Bells installed as a memorial for those beloved in your community, we shall be glad to send you a descriptive brochure, giving complete details.

tunity for self development, can help to mitigate the tensions of our industrial society.

In the present crisis of society let us recall the great apostle's saying, "Brethren, the time is short." Today we understand the urgency of his appeal. For nothing is the same, nor can be again, since August, 1945. And if we as individuals are to be true members of the Church of Christ and help her be what she should in this modern world, we shall have to return to the source of our spiritual power and our social convictions. "There is a faculty," said a great philosopher of the third century, Plotinus, "which all have but few use." It is the spiritual faculty through which man can sense the presence of God, through which God can speak to man, a faculty which all have but few use. If, however, the Church is to recover her spiritual power, it will be because we, the people of the Church, make use of that faculty, make time in our busy lives for contemplation, for prayer, for spiritual nurture. "We are kings when we are in the spirit." Here we reach our highest dignity, our real nature. That is our home, our natural environment. And many of us are homesick, neglecting it. It can all be summed up in a very simple word: keep close to God, keep close to God whom we know best through Christ. Keep close to God through whose power we are wiser than we know. For it is out of actual spiritual experience that religious conviction arises. And out of religious conviction stem our social aspirations — our will for a better world for all peoples. It is here we find the strength, the courage, the wisdom to face our day.

JOHN H. COOK
Layman of Albany, N. Y.

The Rev. E. W. Averill's letter (March 14) prompts me to add that if all the hymns and canticles that mention Jesus as Lord (or God) were to be omitted from hymnal and Prayer Book there would still be a sufficient body of material for services to be drawn from; and it would only be an exceptional layman who would know the difference. Not long ago I brought a Jewish friend to our morning prayer and sermon. Of course I knew that his failure to comprehend why Christians should deify a young Jew whose wisdom-teaching they found so impossible to assimulate and live up to, was the cause of division between our religions; but I was not prepared to be made to realize, through him, how far the worship of Jesus-as-God had been allowed to drop into the background of our services. He found very little that was objectionable in the hymns, canticles, scripture or sermon (on Joseph's brothers) and no real cause for offense, from his point of view, except our ornate symbolic representation of Christ the King behind the altar. This he thought illogical in a congregation which professed to observe the second of the prohibitions—prohibitions that were wise psychologically if not more.

REV. ROBERT MILLER
Cambridge, Massachusetts

In THE WITNESS of March 21st the Rev. Charles F. Hall writes of Dr. C. W. Lowry's "magnificent work" on the "Trinity and Christian Devotion" but seems to regret its choice by the Presiding Bishop as his Lenten book. He even suggests a committee to advise that eminent dignitary on future choices. But bishops, if they are well-advised, will not be easily advised, least of all by committees. They often find it better to advise the committee. The late Archbishop Temple, who might be called the prime mover in the choice of Dr. Lowry's book, was probably concerned that the laity should study the difficult doctrine of the Trinity (and the clergy too, for that matter). He may have thought that the "cookies on the shelf" that Billy Sunday recommended were of little worth as compared with a sound knowledge of the "fundamentals."

REV. ARTHUR M. DUNSTAN
Rector of St. Mark's, Warren, R. I.

The artcle "Innocent Improvements" by Dean Suter in your issue of March 21st reads well and is almost convincing. But somewhere in my recollection is an article by the same author, may be it was published in THE WITNESS, soon after the present Prayer Book was issued for use, wherein definite suggestions were made for the next revision. One of these was the elimination of the words "body and blood" in the prayer of consecration (except the words of institution) and the prayer of humble access. It was claimed they are too carnal and repulsive. Dean Suter may have changed his mind. That privilege is accorded him. However the suggestion has been made and it goes without saying such would be controversial and would certainly "rock the boat." I admit no such change is suggested in the article of March 21st but in view of the former statement it is very probable such would be brought forth if revision were attempted now. Let well enough alone.

REV. GARDINER M. DAY
Rector of Christ Church, Cambridge

As a general principle I believe that a diocesan convention should not instruct its deputies in regard to their action or voting in General Convention. I believe a diocesan convention should elect representative men of as considerable competence and wisdom as possible and then trust them to weigh the issues coming before General Convention and vote in accordance with their best judgment. Take, for example, the question of union with the Presbyterians which, presumably, will come before General Convention in September in some form. How can any diocesan convention meeting at present instruct deputies intelligently as to how they should vote on this matter when no one yet knows what proposals will be placed before the Church by our commission on approaches to unity. Furthermore, how can they instruct, as Mr. Bartow suggests in THE WITNESS of April 4th, the deputies "to insist that the matter be brought to a vote in General Convention and to advocate the passage of favorable action" when we do not yet know whether the commission will bring the proposals before the Convention to be voted upon or whether there will be sufficient time following the publication of the commission's report for the mind of the Church to be prepared for such a vote?

It seems to me a diocesan convention could properly ask those who are nominated to be deputies to General Convention to state whether they are, generally speaking, in favor of union with the Presbyterians if and when a proposal for such a union comes before the Convention as a practical possibility or whether they are irrevocably opposed to any such union, so that those voting in the diocesan convention could be sure to send persons who in general represent the mind of the diocese as expressed by the convention. In my opinion it is not wise to go beyond this point. Suppose, for example, a diocese instructed its deputies to vote against union with the Presbyterians. Then suppose when they come to Convention they find that the proposals are so much better than they anticipated that they can in all good conscience vote in favor of them, such a vote on their part presumably would be prevented by the action of their convention taken without knowledge of the proposals. Furthermore, I think it is an open question as to whether a diocesan convention has the right to instruct its deputies. But irrespective of the "right" I believe that as a policy it is unfortunate and unwise.

C. M. LaFollette in Congress Tries To Be Christian

Former Warden of Indiana Parish Has Notable Record During His Four Years in the House

By W. B. Spofford

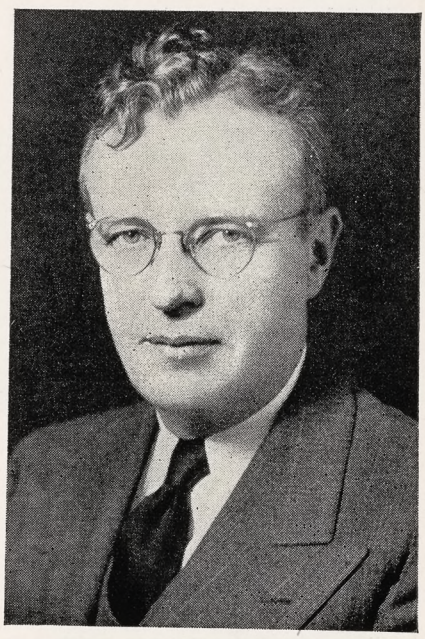
Washington:—There are two men in the Congress of the United States who are said by their colleagues to be fanatics on the subject of Christianity. There has been a good bit in THE WITNESS about one of them: Jerry Voorhis, Democratic Congressman from California. The other is a Republican, Charles M. LaFollette of Indiana. In considering any bill before the House, LaFollette, like Voorhis, asks himself, "What is the Christian thing to do?" As a result he has taken a progressive position on practically every issue, including the abolition of the poll tax, on which he has been a leader; placing the atomic bomb in the hands of civilians; developing a program of full employment; perfecting legislation for greater social security; backing the UNO to the hilt; maintaining and strengthening the fair employment practices committee.

Charles LaFollette hails from Evansville, Indiana, where he is a member of St. Paul's Church, and where he served as a warden until going to Washington. As a member of the parish he promoted many social activities and entered wholeheartedly into various local reform movements led by the Rev. Joseph Moore until the rector enlisted to serve as a chaplain in the Pacific.

With this fine record as a progressive Congressman, LaFollette has now announced that he will run for the Senate, opposing the present incumbent, Senator Raymond E. Willis, when the Republican party of the state holds its convention in June.

"I will appeal to the Republicans in Indiana as a radical Republican," said the Congressman on being asked about his platform. "Radical means fundamental. Therefore it means forthright, and forthright includes those intellectual and moral integrities which are essential to the maintenance of our republic."

Unfortunately in Indiana candidates for the Senate are picked by the convention, and in that state, as elsewhere, conventions are generally controlled by party machines. Charles LaFollette knows this of course but nevertheless enters the race confident that he will win.



I first met him a number of years ago in Evansville when he was the righthand man of Rector Joe Moore. As a young and progressive lawyer, who was devoted to his Church, he was backing his rector to the limit in all sorts of progressive activities. Together they led a fight against corruption in local politics; they backed the trade union movement; they stood together for concerted action on the part of democratic nations against fascist aggression at a time when most people in the city were isolationists. I spent an evening with him recently and found him to be no less enthusiastic for just causes. As a matter of fact our evening was spent in Chicago, with the Congressman having made a hurried trip by plane in order to address a relatively small meeting on behalf of fair employment practices legislation.

We talked about the Church and Christianity. "I have to take a good bit of kidding about it. There are those in Congress who think that I take it too seriously and they are constantly telling me that I should be more practical if I expect to get anywhere. What they mean of course is that I should compromise Christian principles. But I believe that there is nothing more practical in the long run than the Christian religion. I believe, too, that it is a seven day affair and should be applied to all areas of life—social and industrial as well as personal."

The Congressman, who one day may be Senator, is in his forties and is distantly related to the Wisconsin family of the same name. "There is a good deal of confusion over that," he said with a grin. "As a matter of fact many people call me Senator. Let's hope it is a good omen."

NO MORE FOOD AT CHURCH

Portland, Ore.:—Bishop Dagwell of Oregon has urged churches in his dioceses to eliminate refreshments at church affairs in order to further foreign relief.

Charles M. LaFollette, Republican Congressman of Indiana, Church Warden, has made a notable record in the House

CONFERENCES OF WEST COAST

San Francisco:—National Council officials, headed by the Presiding Bishop, travelled to the West Coast just before Easter to answer the question: "What is the Word and Will of God for His Church in the Eighth Province Today?" Just what the answer was we have not yet heard, though we are frankly curious, particularly in what respects God's will differs in the 8th province from, say, the 2nd. Anyhow there were 72 clergy and lay people at the conference in Portland, representing the northwestern dioceses and districts. There were 86 here, representing California, Los Angeles, Arizona, Nevada, San Joaquin and Utah.

LONG ISLAND LAYMEN MEET BISHOP

Garden City, N. Y.:—The bishop's men, organization of laymen of the diocese of Long Island, met with Bishop DeWolfe at the cathedral house here on April 5th, with about 1,000 present. The purpose of the organization is study, worship and work, with Bishop DeWolfe giving a course of study on the doctrine of the incarnation. Members of the organization wear lapel buttons picturing the pastoral staff cleaving the symbolic waves of the sea as depicted in the diocesan crest.

EUROPEAN FAMILIES "ADOPTED"

Buffalo, N. Y.:—Close to 400 European families have been "adopted" by parishes of the diocese of Western New York. Bishop Davis early this year, urged relief for the destitute of Europe. After studying the problem a special committee of the social service department asked Church people to be responsible for a specific family in Italy, Finland Greece, France, Poland or elswhere in Europe. Thus would they not only see that a particular family survived, but would also send them messages of sympathy and understanding—a direct outpouring of practical good will. Forty-eight parishes are now working on the program, with the families abroad selected after investigation.

The program was explained at a meeting of rectors and parish workers on April 9th, held at Trinity Church here. Plans were made for expanding the work during the coming months. The chairman of the committee is Mrs. George Fort Milton who is assisted by eight district chairmen who keep in touch with parish groups.

WOMAN MINISTER RESIGNS

London (wireless to RNS): — The irregularity caused by the "ordination" of a Chinese woman by Bishop R. O. Hall of Hong Kong nearly two years ago has been remedied, according to information received here by Archbishop of Canterbury. Under Church of England canons, a woman cannot become a minister. The Archbishop reported receipt of a resolution recently adopted by the House of Bishops of the Holy Catholic Church in China which condemned the action of the Bishop of Hong Kong in ordaining Miss Lei Tim Oi, a deaconess, to the priesthood and announcing that Miss Lei has now resigned. The resolution requested that the bishop accept the resignation. Archbishop Fisher was informed that the Bishop of Hong Kong has since acceded to the wishes of his fellow-bishops and hence the anomaly of a woman minister in the Church of England no longer exists.

URGES CHURCH-LABOR COOPERATION

Des Moines, Iowa (RNS):—A common Church-labor approach to problems affecting the people's interests was advocated here by John Jacobson, of Minneapolis, regional director of the CIO's Political Action Committee, at a midwest area meeting of the Lutheran welfare conference. Jacobson declared that the Church must leave behind its traditional neutrality on all social and economic issues. He said that the CIO is seeking to establish a constructive relationship with Church groups, and added it was up to the Church to make a similar decision. The Church, Jacobson said, must "re-examine its mission among the people . . . re-orient its social program so as to provide a sound and continuing basis for cooperation with organized labor in achieving the greatest possible benefit to the great mass of people."

Areas of agreement between the Church and labor listed by Jacobson were: 1—Interest in maintaining peace and preventing future wars. 2—Social legislation to improve health, housing, living standards, and security of the common man. 3—Protection and extension of American democracy through the abolition of racial discrimination, the poll tax, anti-labor legislation, and congressional intolerance.

WAR SURPLUS AGENCY ADMITS ERROR

Baltimore, Md. (RNS):—The local office of the war assets corporation here has answered criticisms of its recent sale of surplus government photographic equipment to religious and other groups by admitting that it had advertised the sale misleadingly. The office said also that it failed to differentiate between tax-supported institutions and non-profit religious and charitable agencies in the granting of purchasing priorities. The admission followed a storm of protest on the part of veterans and veterans' organizations when the ex-GIs found their priorities put them after government agencies and the religious and charitable groups. The bulk of the equipment thus was sold before the veterans were allowed to buy.

Legally, it has now been learned, only those non-profit and charitable organizations which also are tax-supported should have been accorded second priority after federal government agencies which have first choice. Such institutions which are not tax-supported should have been given fourth priority after the veterans.

Evergreen Conferences Present Distinguished Faculty

Conferences Open on June Ninth and Will Meet Continuously Through Summer Months

By M. Lewis Marsh, Jr.

Evergreen, Colo.:—The deans of the conferences here have announced faculties for the summer of 1946, comprising a distinguished list. The Rev. Charles V. Young presents the following program for the diocesan youth conferences, June 9 to 14, and 16 to 21: Some interesting facts about the Church, led by Bishop Sumner F. E. Walters, of San Joaquin. Church History, will be taught by the Rev. Edward C. Turner, rector of Ascension and Holy Trinity, Pueblo, Colorado. Personal Religion, will be conducted by Mr. C. T. Abbott, Jr., lay assistant, St. Mark's Parish, Denver.

The Church Workers Conference and School of the Prophets will be held July 15 to 26th. The Rev. Harold L. Bowen, dean, announces that the first three hours of the conference day will be given to the study of the life and teaching of St. Paul. These three courses have been integrated by the lecturers: Living with Paul—meditations on some of the experiences of the great apostle, with lessons to be learned therefrom for daily living, by the Rev. R. Everett Carr, rector of Emmanuel Church, La Grange, Illinois, and chaplain for the conference. Thinking with Paul, a simple discussion course about some of the more prominent of St. Paul's beliefs and teachings, and their application to modern personal and social life, will be by the dean of the conference, the Rev. Harold L. Bowen, rector of St. Mark's Church, Evanston, Illinois.

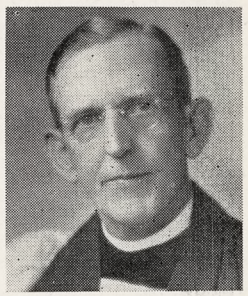
Singing with Paul, the main thoughts of the courses given by the chaplain and dean as expressed in the poetry and music of the Church in the Hymnal 1940, will be given by the Rev. Arthur W. Farlander, rector of the Church of the Incarnation, Santa Rosa, Calif., and member of the hymnal commission.

In addition to the above a course in the use of the Bible in church school classes, the Teacher and her Bible, will be given by Mrs. Robert G. Cargill of Minneapolis. Mrs. Cargill is well known for her successful presentation of the work to Church School leaders.

The annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary in Evergreen will be held on Monday, July 15th, and will be addressed by members of the faculty of the Church Workers Conference.

The Rev. Walter Williams, dean of the School of Church Music, July 28 to August 17, announces the following program and faculty: Contemporary Religious Music, and a small seminar on Creative Composition, for advanced students, will be given by Dr. Leo Sowerby, member of the joint commission on hymnal revision; choirmaster and organist of St. James' Church, Chicago, and professor of theory at the American Conservatory of Music, Chicago; and outstanding composer of orchestral, organ, piano and choral music. Seminar in choir training and service playing, for advanced students; and fundamentals of choir and voice training, for less advanced students, will be given by Mr. Myron Cassner, Christ Church Cathedral, St. Louis, Missouri. The Texts and Music of the Hymnal 1940, will be given by the Rev. Arthur W. Farlander, who also gives a course at the Church Workers Conference and School of the Prophets, preceding the School of Church Music. Elizabethan Polyphony and its influence on the English anthem, is offered by Leonard Elliwoond, Library of Congress, Washington, D. C., and member of the committee on the Handbook to the Hymnal 1940.

Special lecturers include Mr. David Pew, choirmaster and organist of St. John's Cathedral, Denver; Mr. Darwin Letiz, pupil of Dr. Sowerby, of Chicago; the Rev. Wilfrid Layton, choirmaster and organist, St. Paul's Church, Flint, Michigan; Mrs. C. K. Carruth, choirmaster and organist, St. Paul's Church, Oakland, Calif., and instructor in harmony at Mills College.



The dean, the Rev. Walter Williams, rector of St. Mark's Church, Denver, will give the following courses: Repertoire for choir and organ, and service playing, for less advanced students; The Dean's Half Hour, for the entire conference; and Chanting, Plainsong and Anglican, given in connection with the daily choral evensong for the whole conference.

In the evenings a period of singing will be conducted by Dr. Sowerby, Mr. Cassner and the dean, both to become acquainted with rarely sung fine religious music, and to hear the music discussed in the various classes.

Special classes will be conducted for clergy at the School of Church Music, as following: Preaching from the Prayer Book by the Rev. Frederic S. Fleming, rector of Trinity Church, New York; The Text and Music of the Hymnal 1940 by the Rev. Arthur W. Farlander and The Spirit and Practice of Liturgical Worship, the Rev. Walter Williams.

SCHOLARSHIPS FOR EUROPEANS

Buck Hill Falls, Pa. (RNS):—A million-dollar scholarship fund for students abroad who wish to obtain their education at Methodist schools in this country was announced by the general board of education of The Methodist Church meeting here. The fund will be administered jointly by the board of education and the board of missions.

It is expected that 250 students will benefit by the plan, money for which will come from the $25,000,000 collected by the Church in its recent Crusade for Christ campaign. Forty scholarships have already been granted, John O. Gross, general secretary of the department of institutions of the board, announced.

In a report of the commission on ministerial training, William K. Anderson, director, revealed that 500 servicemen have expressed a desire to enter the Methodist ministry. Anderson also said that the commission plans to set up a Washington seminar study for clergymen to allow them to investigate current political, economic, and social problems. The seminar will be held in conjunction with American University.

BOYS' REPUBLIC CONFIRMATION

Detroit:—Bishop Creighton confirmed thirteen boys at the Boys' Republic on April 4. This is a correctional institution, operated on the honor system, and the annual confirmation is a major event.

CATHEDRAL HAS FARMERETTES

Boston:—For some years a group of boys have worked on the cathedral farm. Last year, as an experiment, girls were organized as farmerettes, helping with the canning of fruits and vegetables. Both the groups also help in the cathedral work during the winter. The Easter offering this year is to be used to aid in the development of this work, particularly for the installation of freezing equipment and provision for storage space.

MATRICULATION AT PACIFIC

Berkeley, Calif.:—Presiding Bishop H. St. George Tucker was the presiding officer at the matriculation service at the Church Divinity School of the Pacific, April 1. He also addressed the incoming class of veterans.

THERE'S ANOTHER MILLER GIRL

Berkeley, Calif.:—The Rev. and Mrs. Randolph Crump Miller of the Church Divinity School of the Pacific welcomed a fourth daughter on April 2—Muriel Randolph Miller. Bishop Stevens of Los Angeles, also with four daughters, said, "Miller is no rival—not until he also has ten grandchildren."

URGE GOVERNMENT ACTION

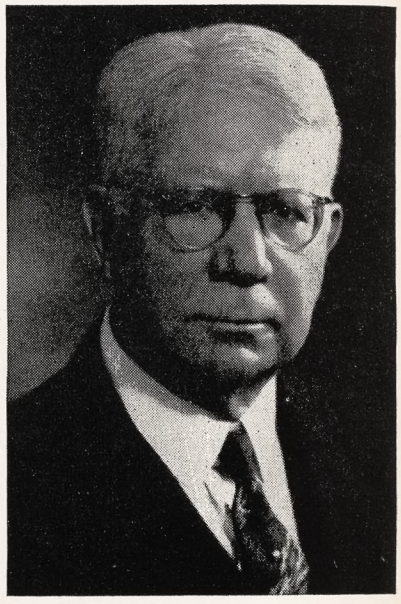
New York (RNS): — Immediate government action to cope with the worldwide food problem was urged on President Truman by Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam, president, and Samuel McCrea Cavert, general secretary, of the Federal Council of Churches, in an urgent appeal to the White House. Declaring that the present crisis cannot be met by the "sporadic and uncoordinated efforts of individual citizens and voluntary agencies," the Church leaders advocated three specific procedures to be adopted by the government:

1—That a percentage of our wheat supply be withheld at the source from the domestic market, the amount thus withheld being allocated to foreign relief.

2—That in the interest of a long-range sharing of our food with the hungrier people of the world a program of consumer rationing be re-established.

3—That a proclamation by the President designate one or more wheatless days per week on which no bread will be served.

JACKSON WOMEN ORGANIZE



Jackson, Mich.: — Church women of this city formed a Council on April 8th at a meeting held at St. Paul's. It came as a result of an address given at the diocesan convention by Miss Mary Pardee of Connecticut who spoke so feelingly about the need for such organizations that the women of Jackson decided to do something about it. The speaker at the meeting here was Mrs. John C. Young, field representative of the Michigan Council.

RELIGIOUS CENSUS IS PLANNED

Washington (RNS): — Congress committee on appropriations is on record as favoring a religious census this year.

CHURCH UNION HOLDS MEETINGS

Doylestown, Pa.:—The Rev. Frank Damrosch Jr. has announced the programs of clergy conventions to be held in Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, Denver, Dallas, Los Angeles and San Francisco. The proposed marriage canons (WITNESS, April 4) and unity are the two major subjects to be considered. Papers are to be read as follows: Chicago: the Rev. Harold Holt, the Rev. Hewitt Vinnedge, the Rev. Paul Kramer, the Rev. Donald Wattley. Denver: Mr. William W. Grant, the Rev. Leon Morris, Dean Dunham Taylor,

The Rev. Alexander G. Cummins announced his resignation as rector of Christ Church, Poughkeepsie, N. Y. on Palm Sunday after serving the parish for forty-six years the Rev. John P. Craine. Los Angeles: the Rev. Richard T. Loring, the Rev. George W. Morrell Jr., the Rev. Felix Cirlot, the Rev. Donald Glazebrook. Boston: Bishop Loring, the Rev. Robert Casey, the Rev. Granville Williams, the Rev. Robert B. Rodenmayer, the Rev. Edward Roche Hardy, the Rev. Whitney Hale. Dallas: Bishop Avery Mason, the Rev. John S. Higgins, the Rev. G. F. Burrill; the Rev. A. W. Watts, the Rev. William T. Holt Jr. San Francisco: Canon Montizambert, the Rev. Charles P. Boes, Bishop Lewis, the Rev. John Crum, the Rev. James M. Malloch. The Philadelphia program has been previously announced in these columns.

All the meetings are under the auspices of the American Church Union.

A New Kind of Life

NO CONVICTION has ever come to man with more force than the conviction that Christ is a living available power. Read the assured words of St. Peter as he speaks after the resurrection. Peter, who had been so uncertain and at the mercy of such changing impulses, stands up before the people he had been afraid to face and says: "Let all the house of Israel therefore know assuredly that God has made him both Lord and Christ, this Jesus whom you crucified." It comes as no surprise to learn that Christians were obliged to use new words to express their new faith, or to use old words in an entirely new way. Such words as love, joy, humility, peace, faith, hope. Those words in their New Testament meaning are of the very essence of the Christian faith, they belong to it and are characteristic of it. There was a new radiance of life which no darkness could put out, the radiance which came with the realization that Christ was the victor and that his victory was theirs.

So at Easter we celebrate a victory, not the hope of one. The faith of Easter is not that our Lord survived death and lives on in some other world in which we may someday live, but that he reigns in power and is with those who strive to do his will in this world. The faith of Easter is not the easy promise of immortality to all men, the notion that God is a good fellow and will make everything all right for us in the end. The faith of Easter is the assurance that through the power of Christ we are able now to live the life that is eternal.

At the heart of the gospel is the cross and the resurrection: God in his power meeting sin and death at their strongest and winning the victory. The New Testament has little concern for immortality, for the mere continuation of life after death. It sets before us the mighty act of redemption: God offering to us an entirely new kind of life now. We are invited to share in the life of the divine society, the Church, and to be workers for that new life in the world, in politics, in industry and in every area of human relations.

PRAYER

ALMIGHTY GOD, who alone canst quicken thy servants to hear thee and obey, we pray for all bishops and deputies to the General Convention and delegates of the Woman's Auxiliary of this Church, that they may be cleansed by thy spirit from all unworthiness. Give them a world of vision of the mission of thy Church; grant them patience and insight, faith and obedience to thy holy will, that being themselves led by thee, they may by thy spirit lead thy people on from strength to strength in the work of thy kingdom; through Jesus Christ thy Son, our Lord. Amen.

—Authorized for General Convention by Bishop Hart of Pennsylvania

Easter does not turn our attention to another world into which we shall enter after death. Easter gives us the assurance that in Christ that other world is now at hand and all its resources are offered to us to use in the service of our Lord and his kingdom.

Committed to Your Charge

ONE of the greatest joys of the ministry is the growth of the bonds of affection which unite pastor and people in the Christian family. Unless the priest is a true Father-in-God to his people, with or without the title, the people committed to his care will not readily respond to his ministrations. If he rigorously excludes the human element in his relations with them, choosing rather to be a stern reminder of their duty to Mother Church and to God, the parish will soon become a cold and barren travesty of the household of faith where all of God's children delight to dwell.

But there is a danger here which the all-too-human parson avoids only with the greatest difficulty. Indeed the difficulty is so great, that he sometimes seeks to avoid it not at all. As the years of the pastoral ministry in one place lengthen and multiply, the bonds of both human and godly affection grow stronger and stronger,—as strong as life itself. Indeed, it is life. The Christian ministry is both justified and proven in this spiritual relationship by which both pastor and people grow in the knowledge and love of God as they draw close to each other.

Yet inevitably the time comes when it is right for the scene of a man's ministry to be changed, lest he cease to grow, and his people knowing no other man of God, assume that there is no other like unto him. Some men will accept a call to another parish; others whose pastoral genius is widely recognized will be asked to become the chief pastor of some diocese in the office of a bishop. In either case the people committed to his charge will be a different people, and from henceforth his love and devotion must go to meet their needs. For quite some time the people to whom he has already ministered for so long will be sure that for them there can be no other minister than Dr. A or Father B. He will be asked to come "home" again and again to baptize the children, marry the young whom he has already baptized,—or to bury the dead who have been such close and beloved friends for many years. Or he may just be invited to come back often as "one of the family" for a visit or a vacation. The danger is that the ex-parson will not refuse. He is too ready, too often to be beguiled into believing that the Rev. Mr. C. called to succeed him can never really take his place. So return he does, in one way or another, thus making it difficult for the new minister to become as soon as possible an old and trusted friend ready to do what he can to carry on the good work which those who preceded him have done. This he will be able to do in his own way if the hearts and minds of the people are not turned again and again by the re-appearance, ever so innocently, of him who was the proper recipient of their earlier love.

Let all the priests of the Church read again the question asked them by the bishop at the time of their ordination. Then the promise was made repeatedly to teach and to preach and administer the sacraments to "the people committed to your care and charge," meaning obviously the people of the parish of one's current ministry. To permit nostalgia and sentiment and pride to draw one back to the old familiar scene and the still beloved, is to cripple the ministry of another and if persisted in it may make forfeit one's own further usefulness.

There is too much of this going on in the Episcopal Church, most of it thoughtless. Those who are faithful to the Church and to their ordination vows, and who really love the brethren, will do such things no more forever.

The Cost of Pensions

by Charles Howard Graf

Rector of St. John's in the Village, New York

THE recent report of the Church Pension Fund and the petition to be presented to the 1946 General Convention provides an opportunity for the Church to appraise the work of the Fund and the future security of those who are or eventually will be dependent upon it. That there is a generally declining rate of income on investments and a necessary increase in pension assessments is readily granted. The small buyer of securities is in a position to purchase bonds and preferred stocks which in total will yield more than 2¾%, but this becomes impossible when a fund as large as our Pension Fund must buy in large units. Nor can the Fund risk purchasing long term bonds or mortgages of high yield. In 1917 a 4% return could be expected, but in 1932-3 a rate of decline began which has now reached a new low, 2½-2¾%.

There are only two avenues, as the report also states, which may be safely taken in such a situation—either lower the benefits of the Fund, or increase the pension assessment to make up the difference. The former is unthinkable. To reduce the benefits would only worsen an already deplorable condition. The average pension now paid is only $914. In certain cases the pension granted is much less. A young priest in an eastern diocese recently died leaving a wife and an infant child. The total pension granted was $400 per year. Upon the death of a bishop recently, the widow, an invalid, received $400 per year. We must face the fact, too, that inflation is upon us, that if it gets worse the hardships will increase upon those who are the responsibility of the whole Church. There must be no reduction of the benefits of the Fund. No recent annual reports state the individual pensions granted, only that they are granted, the amount is not specified. It would be well for every priest to inquire about his pension.

The General Convention must, therefore, grant an increase in the pension assessment, in some percentage higher than the established 7½%. The trustees of the Church Pension Fund have petitioned for an increase to 10%. This will mean that every deacon, priest, and bishop of the Church must see to it that the laity of the Church raise 33% additional pension premium—for Convention has ruled that it is the laity of the Church who must support the Fund. The present pension income of the Fund is $1,192,203.36 per year. When this is raised 33% the income of the Fund from assessments alone will be $1,589,604.48. Assuming that a priest receives a salary of $2500 per year and rectory the pension assessment will be raised from $218 to $291 per year. Is this large increase necessary without increasing also the benefits of the Fund? The trustees do not offer to increase the benefits in any way.

The present investment income is $1,238,-882.00 per year. Under the new rate of 2¾% that income will be reduced approximately to $1,058,882.00. It is therefore the intention of the Fund to overbalance this decline of $180,-000.00 by increasing the pension assessments by $393,427.00 per year. Since the Fund has been accumulating nearly $1,000,000 surplus each year since 1917 for actuarial purposes and future protection the only conclusion which can be drawn is that the Fund is asking for more than it expects to get, or that it wishes to increase its surplus, or that it anticipates a further decline in investment income and wants to be prepared for such an unhappy event. Nor is there a promise that should investment income increase there would be a corresponding increase in benefits, or a lowering of the assessment rate.

In the special report, November 1945, the Fund compares our system with that of a dozen Protestant pension systems, and shows that only one charges less than our present 7½%, while all the others charge more. The report does not, however, say that some of these are on a contributory basis, that is, the church pays part of the premium and the clergyman the rest. In such cases the clergyman would have some rights as to the eventual disposition of the funds which he had contributed to that pension fund. The clergy of the Episcopal Church have no power to decide, except through General Convention, to whom the pension shall be paid. This frequently results in injustice to those clergy of our Church who do not marry, but yet who have dependents, or relatives who have devoted a lifetime of service taking care of the bachelor priest. It is admitted, of course, that to provide protection for such people would increase the whole cost, but it would be fair. The large number of bachelor or widower clergy help to maintain the pension levels which many of them will never live to enjoy.

THE Fund points out the comparison of its system with that of the commercial annuity contracts. As a matter of fact for the amount paid by the laity for clergy pension protection a much better return can be found in annuity contracts which also allow the assignment of the benefits. Our Fund must deal with the group, and all by canon law who are ordained must be members of the group, whereas the annuity contract is made on an individual basis. The trouble with the annuity is that the young priest who can get the best bargain in annuities cannot afford them at all, and then when he is older they are too expensive. There are no insurance aspects to our Fund as are present in the usual individual annuity contract. If a priest dies in his work (either because of it or in spite of it) the pension to his widow is based upon a small percentage of his then total salary, but not less than $300 per year. This is true also in cases of complete disability at or above a limited minimum. The annuity contract, however, guarantees to the policyholder that a definite amount will be paid to him or his named beneficiary even if not all the premiums have been paid. The element of force in our Fund assures the present inadequate protection which the poorly paid priest could never pay out of his own income.

The best and the safest manner in which to increase retirement income is to pay fair salaries to all our clergy, and to meet rising costs of living with rising salaries. The average industrial pension system is built around the conception that the retiring worker shall receive one-half his last annual salary as his annual pension beginning at age 65, and in the event of his death that annuity shall be paid to his named beneficiary. We should aim at no less. The knowledge that they will receive only a thousand dollars a year upon retirement drives men to seek parishes which will secure for them a decent future, or else forces them to continue in parish work beyond retirement age which may not be good for the priest or the parish. To build up missionary stipends to higher levels will at once solve the problem of retirement security and stabilize the priests who are on the firing line of the Church in missionary districts. If pensions be the concern of the laity, and they themselves have made it so, then the salaries which are paid to the clergy should be the fundamental concern of the laity as a whole and not our bishops and National Council alone. General Convention might well look into the problem of salaries, too, when it considers pensions. A minimum national scale of salaries would crystalize the importance of this subject in the minds of the laity.

In order to live many retired priests have had to turn to secular work to augment inadequate pensions. This, under the terms of the Pension Fund is permitted—as long as it is secular work. When, however, the retired priest seeks to augment a pension which cannot possibly support him and he does so by doing the one thing he does best and for which he has been trained—his vocation—then the Fund assumes the right to say whether or not he can do it, and for how long in one place. So we see the pitiful picture today of old priests compelled to move from one furnished room to another every other month because the Church which has promised them a living, and for which they have given their lives, cannot now support them, and must protect the rights of clergy in active cures.

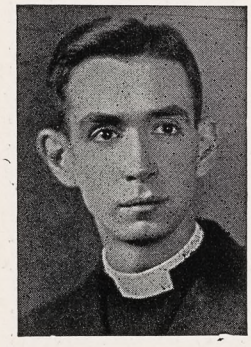
The present cost of administration of the Pension Fund is about $125,000 per year, or an amount equal to 1¼-1½ months premium per year from every ordained man in the Church. The Fund rents large offices in one of the finest buildings in the downtown financial section of New York. It engages the services of leading actuaries and investment houses who are entitled to the highest fees. All of this overhead, effort, and expense for only 6,500 premium payers, the clergy of the Church! It could not cost more if there were 65,000 clergy. It is therefore conceivable that the Fund could be administered by a large banking house with pension facilities for a very considerable saving. Such saving could be used for increased benefits or for reduction of premium.



A full study of these problems must be made. Is it necessary to increase the assessments 33 1/3%, or will a smaller percentage perform the task? If the 33 1/3% increase be adopted by the Convention (and the Fund can impose the increase without consent of Convention) will there not be surplus funds available to augment the entirely inadequate pensions now granted? Would it not be wiser to raise salaries to a just level, then raise pension assessments?

The Living Liturgy

By MASSEY H. SHEPHERD, JR.
Professor at Episcopal Theological School

The Prayer of Humble Access I

FEW prayers of our liturgy are so deep-rooted in our devotions as the one commonly called the Prayer of Humble Access, "We do not presume" (page 82). At the same time few of our liturgical prayers arouse more questions and misgivings among many sincere and devout communicants than this one. Demand for its revision is frequent and persistent. Such demand, however, evokes ardent defenders of the prayer who seem to fear that any change of wording would destroy one of the bulwarks of the Church's sacramental teaching.

We need not tarry over the history of this prayer. One may find the facts in any competent manual of Prayer Book history. Suffice it to say first, that so far as is known the prayer is an original composition of Cranmer, although certain phrases may have been suggested to him by various medieval collects which he knew. Secondly, our 1928 American revision removed it to its present position immediately before communion, where it was originally intended to be, and thus corrected the blunder of the 1552 Book, which had interpolated it after the Sanctus. But its present position serves to call the attention of the worshipper all the more forcibly to it, for it now comes at what is, psychologically speaking, the most tense moment in the service. And it does not "let us down." The prayer is a searchingly vivid statement of our utter unworthiness of God's gifts from the Lord's Table—forgiveness, nourishment and union with Christ.

The first part of the prayer, which deals with our unworthiness of God's mercy, contains two allusions to incidents in our Lord's life of particular significance. The first is to the healing of the servant of that devout centurion who said to Jesus, "Lord, I am not worthy that thou shouldest come under my roof." (See the Gospel for Epiphany IV.) The other is to the healing of the daughter of the Canaanite woman (Gospel for Lent II). These stories are the only instances in the Synoptic Gospels of Jesus' having close relations with Gentiles; and, as if to heighten the effect of His separation from the heathen, they are the only cases where He effects His cures at a distance. His mission as Messiah was to the chosen people of Israel. He came to fulfill the Law and the Prophets, to fulfill the historic destiny and expectation of Abraham's seed. But He was despised and rejected, rejected by those whose boast was in "the righteousness which is of the Law." "He came unto his own, and his own received him not." What Israel in her pride and self-righteousness would not receive, the Gentile in humility and faith would receive. The centurion and the Canaanite woman foreshadow God's adoption of new sons into the stock of Abraham, the new Israel, the new Covenant of those who come unto Him not trusting in their own righteousness but in God's manifold and great mercies.

The second half of our prayer is built around our Lord's teaching as recorded by the Fourth Evangelist (John 6:53-56). It is this section, with its "eating of flesh" and "drinking of blood," that disturbs so many people and evokes scruples in their minds just before they come to receive the sacrament. Their difficulties are not helped by the curious speculation of the medieval scholastics, which Cranmer seems to have accepted, that the bread is for our bodies, and the chalice for our souls. No one today would make such a distinction. Both bread and wine, Body and Blood, are for the cleansing and nourishing of both body and soul, as the Words of Administration make perfectly clear. If there is any justification for revision of this prayer, it is certainly because, to quote Dom Gregory Dix, "there is no particular reason why people should be made to pray mediaeval speculations in a Reformed church."

To come back, however, to the main difficulty, the meaning of "eating of flesh" and "drinking of blood" we need to make a careful study of the whole 6th chapter of St. John's Gospel. As our space has been used up, we shall have to defer a discussion of this until next time. Meanwhile I suggest that you read over carefully this gospel chapter before next week.

Dramatic Arts and Religion

By
WILLIAM B. SPOFFORD, JR.

SOME weeks back, I stated that the English movies are more mature, intelligent and artistic than the American brand. At the present time an English importation is playing in your neighborhood theater that vigorously supports this statement. The film, Love on the Dole, is concerned with a working family in Manchester, England, during the dark and terrible days of 1930. It's a grim picture— but a magnificent one. The father of the family is thrown out of work; the young son, having finished his apprenticeship and foolishly gotten married, walks the pavements of the city looking for a job; the pretty daughter, in love with a labor party organizer, ends up as a prostitute; and the mother stays at home through it all and slowly dies of heart-break. The plot is not resolved: the life of the family is blacker at the end of the picture than it was in the beginning.

But, throughout the film, we are given the gist of the labor party organizer's campaign speeches and they serve as a running commentary on the action. They help to show the damnable, un-Christian nature of a system which puts wealth and profits above human personality.

The National Council has sponsored the film, Marie Louise, in this country. If they want to truly educate Church people to their duty and responsibility, I suggest it also act as sponsor to the film, Love on the Dole. The picture certainly strikes one as being highly prophetic and says something that many sermons never do get across.

The Strange Love of Martha Ivers, starring Barbara Stanwyck and Van Heflin, is another one of those stories about slick, sinful people with no apparent redeeming characteristics. It is cleverly done and features good acting but amounts to nothing but froth.

Hollywood has produced a "re-make" of Owen Wister's The Virginian. Joel McCrae and Brian Donlevy in the principal roles aren't half as good as Gary Cooper and Walter Huston were in the original version and, by and large, it is the dullest Western that it has ever been my bad luck to see. Imagine, only one decent gun-fight in the whole picture. That's not the West as I was taught it in those Saturday afternoon triple-features.

New Books

Good *Fair

The Practice of Religion, by Frederick C. Grant. Macmillan, $2.50.

This book is far more comprehensive than the title indicates. Far from being a book of devotion, though the devotional note is sounded on every page,—it seeks to explain what the Christian religion is, how the religious person practices his religion, and how religion is related to life. The book proceeds on the premise that the "man who would know religion must study it from within, must share its experiences, must himself sense its aspirations and realize its problems; if not, he is like Plato's weavers, studying the pattern forever from the wrong side." To put it more bluntly, the only way to understand religion is to practice it.

One is amazed at the amount of material the author has worked into this book, and at the territory he has covered. Specifically three crucial points are dealt with, the relation of religion to morality, the relation of God to a universe of unchanging law and order, and the relation of religion to the whole of life. The book is readable, it is convincing, and by far the most stimulating book I have read in some time.

Before I had finished reading it, a young woman came to me with the request, "I am to be married in a few months, and I want my marriage to be all that a Christian marriage should be, but I am not a member of any church and I know nothing about the Christian religion. Please tell me what I ought to know and do to be a Christian and to make my marriage a Christian marriage." As a part of the program, I gave her this book. She read it with great interest, said it answered her questions, and asked that she be given it as a permanent possession.

Prof. Grant not only explains the Christian religion in non-technical terms, but makes it an exciting adventure. He actually makes one want to be a practicing Christian! The fact that it made a gay young debutante seeking answers to a deep religious yearning want to profess the Christian life, and become a disciple and member of the Church, is about as convincing an endorsement for this book as could be given.

The Faith of a Protestant*, by W. Burnet Easton, Jr. Macmillan, $1.50.

The other day a young girl who is a confirmed member of the Episcopal Church came to see me. She told me that she was planning to marry a Roman Catholic and had begun to receive the instructions from a priest which the Roman Church requires when a Protestant marries a Catholic even though the Protestant is not joining the Roman Church. In talking with the priest she discovered that she really did not know what she believed herself. She therefore came to me desiring me to tell her what she should believe as a Protestant and wishing to ascertain whether some of the things the priest had told her were correct.

Up until the publication of The Faith of a Protestant I have not known of a small book which contained a brief exposition that would answer this girl's primary question. Now we have it. Mr. Easton, in this little volume, has put in some 76 pages an admirable statement of his own faith as that of a typical Protestant of the younger generation. He has been careful to write simply and clearly, not for the theologian but for the layman, and not for an older person but for the generation of students with whom he has been working as religious director at Massachusetts State College.

No one could try to present such a large subject in such concise form without opening himself to serious criticism. He writes as a Congregationalist, and I believe most Episcopalians will wish that his chapter on the Church were stronger. It would also greatly increase the value of the volume if, along with the final chapter, "The Basis of Social Action," he had a chapter on "The Devotional Life" dealing with the personal religious discipline of a Protestant. Despite these lacks, however, the book is the best brief statement that I have seen and should prove to be tremendously useful for just such persons as the above mentioned young girl.

The Gospel from Iona

★ If Christ is to rule in the market-place and in the international affairs of men—and as it is his world, only his rule will ever bring peace to either—if really we are to be content to embark on the seeming long way round; if, at all points, reconciliation is to rule our methods, and contempt and hatred to be discounted (as the civilization that was Christendom finally dissolves before our eyes); if "all that" is implied by carrying the principles of the communion table into the market-place, then no man can face its demands, far less embark upon its practice, who has not settled for himself—Who Christ is, by what right he demands our allegiance, and whether his claim to be the way and the truth and the life has acceptance in his heart.

(. . . in Iona last summer . . . Some three hundred and fifty youth—in weekly groups of forty—were on the island for their one week's holiday from factories, offices and works . . . their daily worship was in the abbey alongside that of the community. The apex of their conference was an act of belief at the 9 p.m. service on Thursday evenings. It was then that as individuals they might come forward to kneel at the steps before the communion table and make a personal commitment, where in earlier days so many men had dedicated their lives . . .)

By acceptance of the terrible judgment and the glorious hope which is the incarnation of our Lord, we do not claim that the old personal evangelism is outmoded.

The need of it breaks into new life; the declaration of it assumes a new relevance, and we see the point at which twentieth century man, whose social passion is God-given, may again be challenged with the one eternal question, the right answer to which, in every age, alone can save his body and his soul.

Protestants of Japan to Launch Evangelistic Campaign

The Committee Urges that Leading American Preachers Visit the Country to Aid Revival

Edited by Sara Dill

Tokyo (RNS): — A nation-wide Protestant evangelistic campaign will get under way here on June 6, Whitsunday, when the Church of Christ in Japan will hold its first congress comprised of over 300 representatives in preparation for a long and diligent endeavor to spread the Christian gospel among the people of Japan. The Church of Christ had originally scheduled the initial conference for Easter as a formal welcome to visiting American Church delegates, but the plan was changed to gain time for more extensive preparations. By June 6, it is hoped there will be a larger number of American Church people here to give advice and assistance to the growing Christian following. The top committee for the new Christian movement is headed by Toyohiko Kagawa, Christian leader and social worker who is a candidate for the Japanese House of Peers.

Following the Whitsuntide national Christian convention, joint services will be held in various Tokyo churches by each group of the main body. The platform of the convention will be "to foster religious feeling through preaching the gospel as the moral basis of reconstruction of Japan as a peaceful and cultural nation."

Good news to Christians here was the announcement of the arrival of George Ernest Bott and Paul S. Mayer of the Foreign Missions Conference. The two missionaries will work in close liaison with Japanese Christian leaders and allied political officials.

Japanese Christian leaders have expressed satisfaction over the arrival of the two representatives, an advance party of a larger group scheduled to follow.

"What Japan needs most today is prominent American Christian leaders to visit us, work with us, render advice, and spur the Christian youth movement in Japan by visiting large metropolitan areas to preach and lecture," said one official of the Church of Christ in Japan. He specifically mentioned Daniel A. Poling, pastor of Philadelphia's Baptist Temple, and Harry E. Fosdick, New York clergyman, and said that if these two men were to visit Japan the influence they would exert on the Christian movement here would be tremendous.

Kenyon College

Gambier, O.: — One of the features of the commencement at Kenyon College, June 21-24, will be a memorial service conducted by Bishop Hobson of Southern Ohio, honoring the forty alumni who were killed in the war. It was also announced on April 18 that honorary degrees will be awarded to six men and women for distinguished service to the nation.

Health Bill

Washington (RNS): — Representatives of the Methodist Federation for Social Service and the legislative committee, Council for Social Action, Congregational - Christian Churches, have gone on record in the Senate labor committee here favoring the so-called Wagner-Murray-Dingell national health act. The Rev. Jack R. McMichael, executive secretary of the Methodist Federation, told the committee that "the right to be born decently and to have adequate medical and hospital care ever available" is as much a basic right—and as much the responsibility of government—as the right to an education. The Rev. Francis E. McPeek, social service director of the Washington Federation of Churches and chairman of the Congregational-Christian committee, declared that the health of everyone is a "Christian social obligation." He said he believes the proposed compulsory health tax is "eminently fair."

Chinese Colleges

New York (RNS):—China's colleges and universities are beginning the long trek back to home campuses from their refugee sites in Free China, according to information obtained here by the associated boards for Christian colleges in China. Of the 13 institutions largely supported by the boards' funds, 11 were forced to pack up and move when the Japanese over-ran China, but by the opening of the school year in September all 13 expect to be functioning again at their home stands. Three of the schools already have reopened. Lingnan University in Canton, having only 150 miles to travel, reopened last October. Shanghai resumed this month, and the Peiping campus of Yenching University has been open to freshmen and subfreshmen since last October.

Typical of those making the long voyage home is Nanking University which has just started a 2,000-mile journey by Chinese junk and sampan down the Yangtze River from its wartime location at Chengtu.

At the end of the trail for many colleges will be only ruined buildings, stripped libraries, destroyed laboratories, classrooms and chapels. Of the 13 schools, only two—St. John's in Shanghai and West China Union in Chengtu—were spared.

Free Rides

Hickory, N. C.:—Free taxi service for anyone wishing to get to and from church on Sunday has been announced by a local taxicab company. It announces that 19 cabs are being made available for this service and may be called upon for either morning or evening services.

Grows a Beard

Lancaster, Pa. (RNS):—An Amish farmer who purchased a tractor and was subsequently rejected from the sect for his concession to modern machinery has repented, sold the tractor, and is again a church member in good standing.

The man, Abner K. Zook, 25, shaved his beard and disappeared for two days after his violation of the Amish tenets. Following his decision to sell the machine, Zook allowed his beard to grow again and is now back in the good graces of the "plain" sect.

GET-TOGETHER

● There are several clergymen seeking supply work in or near New York during June, July and August. Also a young clergyman, with wife and baby, offers to take services and perform other tasks in a parish in or near New York in return for living quarters. He is employed during the day. . . . There are several parishes looking for curates. . . . There are also a large number of clergymen seeking positions but all wish to have parishes of their own. Anyone interested in any of these possibilities write: Get-Together, THE WITNESS, 135 Liberty Street, New York 6.

In explaining his action, the farmer said he purchased the tractor because labor was scarce and he could not get help for his 100-acre farm. Now he is tilling the farm in the manner approved by Amish church elders—without the use of such machinery as tractors.

Red Cassocks

Mobile, Ala.:—A familiar American custom has spread to New Zealand, according to ex-Chaplain Edgar L. Pennington, now rector of St. John's Church. When Pennington entered the chaplaincy from the Church of the Holy Cross, Miami, Florida, that parish presented him a red cassock, which he and his assistants have since worn half way around the globe. At a great service for the American held in St. Mary's Cathedral, Auckland, New Zealand, the red cassock was worn by James G. Scarlett, pharmacist's mate 2nd class, as crucifer. The Lord Bishop of Auckland, the Rt. Rev. William John Simkin, declared he had never seen a red cassock used by acolytes, and immediately outfitted all the servers at St. Mary's Cathedral, so that this identical cassock was the means of introducing the practice into the churches of New Zealand.

Churches Top List

Minneapolis (RNS): — Churches are doing the most excellent job of five institutions in serving the public, according to the opinion of a cross-section of Minnesota's adult population interviewed by the Minnesota poll. The poll, a service of the Minneapolis Star-Journal and Tribune, asked those interviewed to say whether in their opinion, the churches, schools, local governments, newspapers and radio stations are doing an "excellent," "good," "fair" or "poor" job of meeting their responsibilities. Twenty-seven per cent rate the churches' job as "excellent," putting them in first place in this classification. If "excellent" and "good" classifications are combined, radio stations come first, churches, second. Schools were ranked third, newspapers fourth and local government last.

War Criminals

Moscow (wireless to RNS):—Writing in the latest issue of the Journal of the Moscow Patriarchate, Archbishop Luka of Tambov sharply criticized Pope Pius XII for "asking mercy" for war criminals. Archbishop Luka is well-known in civilian life as Professor Velentine Felixovich Voino-Yasenecki, consulting surgeon to military hospitals.

Although the Archbishop's article failed to quote any specific statement in which the Pope allegedly asked that war criminals be pardoned, it contained such phrases as: "Why is the Pope asking for mercy for the greatest criminals in history? . . . Surely these people cannot be taught justice by the exercise of mercy? . . . Should we pardon all those who prepared and ruthlessly planned the annihilation of whole nations?"

"Great sorrow fills our hearts when we think of the terrible, everlasting tortures that await these outcasts of the human race, but both the justice of God and the conscience of all mankind urgently demand their execution."

Wartime Deception

Minneapolis (RNS):—The "white lies" they told during the war occupation period have returned to plague the people of Norway, according to a Norwegian Church official visiting here. So accustomed did the Norwegians become to deceiving the Germans that it became a part of their daily lives, the Rev. Thorlief Holm-Glad of Oslo, said here. "It was considered a victory if one could deceive a German and no one hesitated," he reported. Now the Norwegians are finding it difficult to shake off the mentality of the occupation period, he said.

"While law and justice have come back to our nation," he declared, "there are many who find it difficult to adjust themselves to the new situation — especially children who learned from babyhood that deception is not always wrong. This is a dangerous situation that we must correct as fast as possible."

Mr. Holm-Glad, who is secretary of youth work for the Norwegian Mission Covenant Church, is in this country to raise $100,000 to help finance establishment of a Bible school in Oslo. He reported that a revival is under way in many churches of Norway.

Human Rights

New York (RNS):—Expansion of its program to extend human rights was announced here by the commission to study the organization of peace. James T. Shotwell, chairman, said the committee on human rights, organized by the commission, will be expanded, and that local human rights committees will be established throughout the country. The national committee will appear before the United Nations Commission on Human Rights which holds its first meeting here April 29. The committee, which has functioned since the Dumbarton Oaks conference, aims to aid the United Nations group "in fostering and enlarging the domain of human rights."

There are a large number of churchman on the committee, with the Episcopal Church represented by Bishop Edward L. Parson, president of the CLID, and the Rev. W. Russell Bowie, professor at Union Seminary.

Atomic Bomb

Chicago (RNS):—Science and religion have joined forces here in an attempt to foster proper use of atomic energy. The midwest conference of atomic scientists and religious leaders, an alliance of Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish leaders and atomic scientists of the University of Chicago, has sent to President Truman and Congress telegrams urging support of the McMahon bill S-1717. The McMahon Bill advocates placing of control and development of atomic energy in the hands of civilians and is opposed to Johnson bill, S-1824, which places control with the army.

Supports UNO

Atlantic City, N. J. (RNS):—A call for the Methodist Church to speak up when measures adopted by the United Nations Organization come before the United States for ratification, was made by Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam of New York in addressing 200 Methodist leaders attending the Crusade for Christ conference here.

"Certainly, when the issues of the peace treaty come up, with underlying difficulties in the matter of trusteeship of the colony areas, it may be wise to have Methodism speak again," he said. "It is quite possible that the question of diplomatic representation at the Vatican may be regarded as an item upon which Methodism will wish to speak up."

He said also that the question of compulsory military training is a matter for church action. "The issue has not yet come to a conclusion, but it would appear that passage of the bill requiring compulsory military training is not likely," he said.

Longley to Broadcast

Charleston, W. Va.: — The Rev. Harry S. Longley, rector of St. John's, is to be the speaker over the coast to coast network of the Church of the Air, Columbia system, on Sunday, April 28, 10:30 to 11, eastern daylight. Some stations may rebroadcast this program at a different time so check your local papers.

Prize to Church

Washington:—Congressman Monroney (D-Okla.) last week received a prize of $10,000 from a national magazine for meritorious legislative service. He immediately announced that the money would go to the diocese of Oklahoma to be used for religious education.

Aid to Germany

Geneva (wireless to RNS): — The future of the German Church will depend upon the part it plays in helping to meet the material as well as spiritual needs of the people at this time, George Federer, assistant chairman of the relief committee of the Evangelical Church in Germany, declared here. He is returning to Germany after spending several weeks discussing German Church problems with officials of the World Council of Churches.

"The Church in Germany will lose ground if it fails to lead in bringing material assistance, but, on the other hand, it will emerge a victor if pastors not only pray for but take the initiative in helping needy persons," he asserted.

Federer, who was a German diplomat during the war in Switzerland where he helped the anti-Nazi movement, said he was encouraged by the offers of outside help for the German people, but stressed he was chiefly heartened by the willingness of foreign churches "to help us help ourselves."

He disclosed that the World Council has promised to send large quantities of food, clothing, blankets, and muslin to Germany, as well as 10,000 pairs of shoes. He said he was "gratified" that the Council has asked American donors to send raw cotton which the Germans can fabricate themselves, thus boosting morale and supplying material needs at the same time.

Marriage Courses

Philadelphia (RNS):—Church groups who sponsor short courses in courtship and marriage, and clergymen who give pre-marital counseling were lauded at the meeting here of the section on religion and the family of the National Conference on Family Relations. In recommending marriage courses and instruction, the churchmen noted that such courses are becoming standard procedure of an increasing part of the ministry.

To strengthen family ties, the group suggested religious observance of the great days of the year; use of music and other forms of art; dedication of homes and homemakers; family councils in a democratic spirit; thanks to God for food; recognition of the human service responsible for each meal, bedtime prayers for children, and family prayers. L. Foster Wood of the Federal Council of Churches was elected chairman of the group for the ensuing year.

Back Governor

Atlanta, Ga. (RNS):—With the Negro suffrage issue the bone of contention in state political circles, the Atlanta Council of Churchwomen has officially endorsed Governor Ellis Arnall's stand in accepting the Negro's right to vote. Opposing the "white primary," the churchwomen's resolution affirmed belief in educational rather than racial qualifications for voting. Observers predict that the action of church groups over the state will have a profound effect upon Georgia's decision as to Negro suffrage.

COMMEMORATION TO WAR DEAD

New York (RNS): — The nation's churches have been urged by the Federal Council of Churches to observe Memorial Day season this year as a special commemoration to those who gave their lives during the war.

Negro Police

Richmond, Va. (RNS):—The executive committee of the Virginia Council of Churches meeting here unanimously adopted a resolution calling for the addition of Negro police in all Virginia cities. It commended the city of Norfolk for its action in adding six uniformed Negro policemen to the force and called on other cities to follow its example.

"The use of Negro policemen has been found effective in the combatting of delinquency and of promoting good will and understanding in the area of race relations," the resolution said.

The committee also passed a resolution calling for establishment of a "great Christian university in Japan by gifts from American Christians."

Youth Work

Newark, N. J.:—Miss Helen Turnbull, director of Windham House, New York, and Miss Daphne Hughes, head of youth consultation work in the diocese, spoke on youth work at the meeting of the diocesan Auxiliary on April 3.

Save Murderer

Sydney, Australia (wireless to RNS):—The Tasmanian Council of Churches, and other religious agencies, have opened a drive here to end capital punishment following the execution of Frederick H. Thompson for the murder of an eight-year-old girl. After Thompson was sentenced the churches asked the government to grant him a reprieve. This request was refused, as was a petition that the punishment be commuted to life imprisonment. Religious leaders hold that the state was partly responsible for the crime as Thompson had been released from detention many times after serving sentences for sex offenses.

Urge Discipline

London (wireless to RNS):—The Church Assembly, governing body of the Anglican Church, has approved a resolution appointing a committee to consider spiritual discipline of the laity, despite protests that such a body involved use of a "spiritual Gestapo."

Proponents of the measure pointed out that the Church's Prayer-Book was formulated upon the assumption that the whole nation would be incorporated in the national Church, and therefore it had imposed a strict form of discipline on the clergy and laity to be enforced, as a last resort, by a secular arm.

The growth of dissent and successive toleration acts, however, have made application of the discipline to the laity, though not to the clergy, impossible.

In opposing the measure, the Bishop of Derby, Alfred Rawlinson, said that any kind of compulsory discipline of the laity was undesirable and for the most part impractical.

Mrs. W. L. Miller, of Southwark, stressed the lax discipline prevailing among churchwomen. She asserted that the majority of women do not know why they are Anglicans.

Unique Window

Birmingham, Ala.:—The Church of the Advent here has installed a stained glass window picturing the Lord's Prayer, said to be the only one of its kind in the world.

Good Friday

Pittsburgh:—This is the 26th year that a three-hour Good Friday community service has been held at St. Stephen's, Wilkinsburg. The Rev. William Porkess, rector, has presided at all of these services and gives two of the eight addresses. The other six are given by clergymen of various denominations.

Unique Experiment

Englewood, N. J.:—In what is believed to be an unique experiment, the rectors, organists, and choirs of the two largest Episcopal parishes in the northern part of the diocese of Newark, exchanged churches for the chief morning service on the fourth Sunday in Lent. Both churches are named "St. Paul's,"—one in Paterson, an industrial city, the other in Englewood, a New York suburb, ten miles apart, the rectors respectively being the Rev. William L. Griffin, Jr. and the Rev. James A. Mitchell. The exchange proved successful in every way, both congregations testifying that the service was devotional and stimulating.

Puerto Rico Has New School

Ponce, P. R.:—Colegio de Agricultura San Jose was blessed on March 19 by Bishop Colemore of Puerto Rico before a large company of clergy and laity. At the same time it was announced that the insular department of education has accredited the school as the only one in Puerto Rico offering courses in vocational agriculture. The purpose of the school, founded last August by the Rev. Ralph K. Webster, is to give boys from rural districts training in agriculture, and to serve as a model in rural reconstruction.

Easter Greetings

London (wireless to RNS):—The British Council of Churches sent Easter greetings to the German Evangelical pastors in prisoner-of-war camps throughout Germany. The message was signed by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, the Rev. A. J. Campbell, moderator of the Church of Scotland, and the Rev. Frank H. Ballard, moderator of the Free Church Federal Council.

Visit Japan

London: — The Archbishop of Canterbury has named two bishops to join representatives of the Church of England in Canada and the Episcopal Church (USA) in bringing greetings to the Church in Japan. They are Bishop Samuel Heaslett, assistant bishop of Sheffield who until 1940 was presiding bishop of the Japanese Church, and Bishop John C. Mann, assistant bishop of Rochester who was formerly Bishop of Kyusha.

Unanimous Vote

Wake Forest, N. C. (RNS):—The trustees of Wake Forest College, third oldest Baptist institution in the country, voted unanimously to move the college to Winston-Salem. Good reason, too, since it will enable the institution to receive a gift of $10,750,000 from the Z. Smith Reynolds Foundation. The gift is expected eventually to reach a total of fifty million.

Holy Week Services

Washington:—Both Protestant and Roman Catholic services were held each day during Holy Week at the Pentagon, the army's huge office building here. They were lead by chaplains from the office of the chief of army chaplains. Services were also held in various other government buildings during the week.

I or some member of my family has taken THE WITNESS for more than 25 years and I do not wish nor intend to ever be without it. It is Christian and fighting and so fair in all of its criticisms. It keeps us continually on our toes. There is no time nor place for the sluggard. More power to you.

Your series on proposed changes in our Church set-up is good. Give us more and include an article on the department of missions. In the face of inroads being made by Protestantism in many communities our Church remains stagnant or withdraws. Ultra-conservatism denies us many ventures of faith in caring for our people and the great body of un-churched. For domestic work we need the spirit of the west: the far west, the southwest, the northwest. The Church needs the continuing spirit of Bishops Polk, Tuttle and Whipple. "Where there is no vision the people perish." While there is no vision the people perish is equally true. Give us the west in our department of missions and the Church will really go places in becoming the people's Church.

MR. SPENCER MILLER JR.
Layman of South Orange, N. J.

For fifty-one years Dr. Beckett Gibbs has served his God, his Church and his fellowmen by the ministry of music. As professor of music, as organist and choirmaster, as one of the pioneers in the English plain song reforms, this gifted musician of British birth has given of his gifts to countless parish churches, and has greatly enriched the worship in both the churches of this country and Britain. Now in the evening of his life, after twenty-one years of service in his latest post, he has been compelled to retire as organist from the last of these parish churches. Because his salary has never been large at any time, because he has given "all for love and nothing for reward," he has come to the end of his "ministry" with little treasure laid up against the future. Because his has been a lay ministry, though dedicated to God, and because no provision has been made either by the Church for its lay employees, nor by the social security act for employees of religious institutions, Dr. Gibbs must face an uncertain and insecure old age. Had he remained a British subject, he would have been provided for under the adequate provisions of the British social insurance law.

But Dr. Gibbs is but one of thousands of devoted laymen in our churches and religious institutions in America for whom no pension provision is made. To be sure his old age pension would have been small even if ten years ago he had been covered by the old age provisions of the social security act, yet because he is a lay employee of the Church he has no pension protection either by Church or state. Thirty years ago the clergy of our Church were wisely and generously provided for by our Church Pension Fund. Every parish is assessed for the pension protection of its rector. Not so the lay employees! And so today Dr. Gibbs is one of the thousands of devoted lay employees who having given of themselves sacrificially in the service of the Church are unprotected in their old age. How long must such injustices continue to affront our moral sensibilities?

MR. HOLLAND H. LOUDEN
Layman of Lakewood, Ohio

Have been following the various comments and expressions relative to union with the Presbyterian Church and as one of the many laymen of the Church who do not have much voice in the councils where important decisions are made, being dependent upon representation by usually picked delegates, whose ideas conform with those of the rector in matters of churchmanship, or because of financial ability, etc., but without any particular convictions one way or the other in some instances.

As the result of these comments and expressions on the part of different individuals, the following questions have come to me: Where are those, who have been attracted to the Episcopal Church from other denominations, because it offered them something that was lacking in the predominantly protestant churchmanship, to go if this union, not necessarily unity, becomes a reality. They certainly will not be happy to be placed again in the same position of making a decision between a Church which puts emphasis on certain matters of faith and practice, and a Church which has yielded to those who do not place any emphasis or value on such.

What would be the attitude of honorable men like Bishop Scarlett and others of like churchmanship, if the Presbyterian Church should have been one less protestant but instead, more catholic in character? Would they be so enthusiastic about the importance of union on the part of denominations?

How is a unity of spirit to be brought about, when it does not exist in our own Church or when different branches of Presbyterianism don't seem to be able to get together? The principle of unity should be exemplified on the part of some of our bishops and ministers before they advocate such with a denomination, which may conform more to their preference, than even their own Church.

I actually tore into THE WITNESS of April 11. The cover went into my picture collection—Colored Christs are hard to find; Adelaide Case's article was filed for future use; Shepherd's Easter collect went into my reference Prayer Book and the marriage article into my book of canons in preparation for diocesan convention. There wasn't much left with the copy after I had filed all the excellent material.

The Tragedy of the Forgotten Jehovah

"They have forsaken Me, the Fountain of Living Waters, and hewn them out broken cisterns which can hold no water. . . Forgotten My Name in Baal. . . My Memorial Name unto all generations."

The great prophets of Jehovah denounced the adding of field to field; condemned the legalization of land monopoly through the foreclosure of loans at interest, operating as mortgages; demanded the abolition of interest on money; and required the writing off of loans at the end of seven years. This program was, of course, utopian and impractical. But the tremendous pressure of the economic problem, subjecting the Israelite rural clans to the heartless tyranny of Baalistic land monopolists, was the central driving force in the evolution of Monotheism.

After the Exile, the Jewish governor Nehemiah, and his clique, loaned money at interest, and foreclosed on poor and needy peasants, who revolted, claiming that they were powerless—"because other men have our land." And in the post-Exile time, the Pentateuch, or Law, including within itself the naive, utopian demands of the prophets, became the Jewish Bible. But the prophetic platform, as expressed in the Law, was nullified and voided by a rabbinic legal instrument, the "Prosbul"; so that loans could be made at interest and foreclosed. The rabbis were compelled reluctantly to take cognizance of money lenders who devoured the houses and lands of the poor, and then made long prayers.

Accordingly, the prophets were brought down from their creative position to the plane of mere interpreters of the Law; and the writings of the prophets were, therefore, kept outside the Jewish Bible proper. The retrocession of the prophets is now at last explained by an able Jewish professor in the Boston Hebrew Teachers College (The Review of Religion—Columbia University Press, Jan., 1946). "If any shall yet prophesy in the name of Jehovah, his father and his mother that begat him shall thrust him through." The names of the great prophets were not given to Jewish children, and therefore are not borne by characters in the Gospels, the Acts, and the Pauline writings.

The name of Jehovah was forbidden to be uttered; and accordingly, the King James Bible, obsequiously following the Jewish practice, renders Jehovah as "the Lord". This usage is continued, with characteristic British caution, by the English Revised. But the American Revised Bible denounces this perversion, and restores Jehovah more than six thousand times in the Old Testament. But the Memorial Name is conspicuously missing from the New Testament.

The worship of One God overshadowed paganism in the Roman Empire; curbed the foulness of heathen worship; and slowly created the spiritual climate of modern civilization. There are many good reasons why the Judeo-Christian tradition has not been able thus far to carry the weight of economic readjustment. But its impulse is toward the generation of social conscience; and in the present world crisis, the Bible as a whole imperatively demands reinterpretation within the framework of world history as now understood by scientific scholarship.

The Virginia Faculty Issues Statement On Unity

The Question of Ordination Should Not Be Allowed to Endanger Negotiation Results

By Virginia Seminary Faculty

Alexandria, Va.: — The following statement has been released by the faculty of the Virginia Theological Seminary, the document being signed by Alexander C. Zabriskie, Stanley Brown-Serman, Robert O. Kevin, A. T. Mollegen, Reuel L. Howe, Robert F. Gibson, Victor B. Stanley, Joseph L. Brown.

We, the faculty of the Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia, are much concerned that the current negotiations between the Episcopal and Presbyterian Churches in the United States of America should result in the organic union of the two churches as soon as possible. Most particularly we hope that the forthcoming General Convention will set the negotiations forward by affirmative action upon the fundamental principles which must underlie any constitution of a united Church.

We do not know what resolutions will be offered by the joint commission on approaches to unity when it submits its report. We know that in its report of 1943 it proposed that all ordinations should be by both Bishop and Presbytery, and that all consecrations should be by at least three Bishops and the Presbytery of the candidate's diocese; that baptism be administered by water in the Name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, and that in the Holy Communion wine be used and the essential parts of the liturgy; that the faith expressed in the historic creeds be safeguarded; and that, while diversity in local practice and in forms of worship should be allowed, the Prayer Book heritage be preserved. We assume that all these elements will be retained.

It seems to us that the crux of the whole problem is the status in the united Church of clergymen ordained in the two different churches prior to the effective date of union. It has been made clear by various Presbyterian writers that the Presbyterian Church cannot agree to any proposal which implies that their ministers have not been effective ministers of the word and sacraments, or their services used by God to convey his grace to their congregations. It may be that the commission has found some solution to this pressing problem. We hope its importance may not be obscured by ambiguities.

We are forced to an historical and theological judgment that the continental and Anglican Reformations were in accordance with God's will and that they were a judgment of God against a Church which had grown corrupt in practice, in which the Bible had been accorded a secondary place, and in which the gospel primarily witnessed to in the New Testament, that men are saved solely by the free grace of God appropriated by faith, had been overlaid and obscured by other emphases.

We believe that the presbyterially ordained ministry forced by historic necessity upon parts of the Church at the time of the Reformation was a ministry raised up by God to continue unbrokenly the apostolic function of witnessing to the gospel and administering the sacraments. It is not valid in the technical and legal sense, for the term valid was brought into use to denote an episcopally ordained ministry. It seems to us that, inasmuch as the purpose of the negotiations between the two Churches is not to discontinue, but to extend an episcopally ordained ministry, the question of technical validity should not be allowed to endanger the result of these negotiations. A ministry raised up by God, whose activities he has used as a means of grace, cannot be regarded as inferior to one which has preserved the mode of ordination observed from about 150 A. D.

We believe that the extension of Catholic order to non-Roman Christendom is one of the chief goods which will result from the union of the Episcopal and Presbyterian Churches. The current conversations have made it quite clear that there will be no break in our line of Bishops. Within relatively short time all ministers of the united Church will be episcopally ordained. There is bound to be a brief period, perhaps fifty years at the most, when there will be some irregularities. These irregularities are a small price to pay for such a gift as the union of two great Churches. That union will probably be the nucleus to which other Churches will adhere, to the eventual formation of a united non-Roman Church. When such a united non-Roman Church, in which have been fused the spiritual treasures of Protestantism and Catholicism, exists, Rome may moderate her pretensions and become genuinely Catholic in her devotion to the gospel instead of sectarian as she now is.

Therefore we hope that General Convention will instruct its commission to continue negotiations with the Presbyterians on the basis that Presbyterian ministers ordained prior to the date of union are to be recognized as effective ministers of the word and sacrament, having equal standing in the united Church with Episcopalian clergymen. It may be that some form of mutual recognition, some mode of supplementary ★ An eastern bishop informs us that he has two splendid parish vacancies in the mission field: each offers $2,400, travel, comfortable rectory . . . . A western bishop has a number of vacancies, each offering $2,000 and rectory and automobile allowance. . . . A number of clergymen are seeking summer supply work, one prefers Illinois or Wisconsin; the other the east. A chaplain, after four years of service in various theaters, informs us that the only church which has called him is one of the Congregational Church. Letters to bishops and other Episcopal authorities bring: "Nothing at the moment; will place you on the list and if I hear etc." Address for this department: Get-Together, THE WITNESS, 135 Liberty Street, New York 6, N. Y.

commissioning, will be desirable. Certainly no congregation should be forced to call a man ordained in the other tradition, and this should be made clear either by agreement that men will serve only in congregations of the tradition in which they were ordained, or else by guarantee that congregations will be furnished with full information about men they contemplate calling. All such details, though very important, are not the real problem. The real problem is whether we recognize Presbyterian ministers as effective ministers of the word and sacrament.

On that issue, it seems to us, General Convention will be as prepared to pass judgment in 1946 as at any future time. The question has been before us since the negotiations began shortly after the war between the States. A great weight of Anglican opinion from the days of Jewell on has regarded the Reformation as in accordance with God's will. We hope that General Convention will unequivocally reassert that judgment this autumn.

WORTHINGTON HEADS PENSION FUND

New York:—Mr. Robert Worthington was elected executive vice-president of the Church Pension Fund by the trustees of the Church Pension Fund on April 24. He has been secretary of the Fund and its affiliates since 1934. He succeeds the late Bradford Locke. Mr. Worthington was also elected executive vice-president of the Church Life Insurance Corporation.

ADELAIDE CASE THE SPEAKER

Newark, N. J.: — Professor Adelaide Case of the Episcopal Theological School was the speaker at the annual meeting of the Auxiliary of Newark, meeting at the diocesan house on May 1. She presented a preview of the triennial meeting of the Auxiliary which will be held in Philadelphia in September at the time of General Convention.

NOTED AUTHOR TO SPEAK

New York:—Konstantin Simonov, newspaper man and author of Days and Nights, is to be the principal speaker at a dinner on May 6, sponsored by the national interfaith committee of Russian Relief. He is to speak on conditions in the Soviet Union and the problems of reconstruction and rehabilitation confronting the Soviet people. The chairman of the interfaith committee, set up to provide a channel for the participation of Church groups in the activities and campaigns of Russian Relief, is the Rev. Ralph W. Sockman, Methodist minister, and the vice-chairmen Bishop Charles K. Gilbert and Dr. Israel Goldstein, president of the Zionist organization. Edward C. Carter, president of the organization, who recently toured devastated areas in the Soviet Union will also speak.

MENTAL HEALTH LECTURES

Philadelphia: — Dr. Edward M. Burn of the Pennsylvania Hospital is giving a series of five lectures on Thursday evening in May for the clergy. Sponsored by the diocesan social service department, the lectures are being given at the Divinity School. The lecturer, an Episcopalian, spent a number of years is the far east before studying medicine, first as an engineer and then as a lay missionary.

LECTURER HITS FRANCO

Hartford, Conn.:—Professor F. E. McMahon of the University of Chicago, speaking at a conference of the Roman Catholic Church on international peace, said that "Catholics must not allow their opposition to bloody intervention in Spain to be construed as an endorsement of a regime which in essence is antithetical to the ideals of Christian principle."

Expressing hope that the Franco regime will soon give way "in peaceful fashion" to a democratic government, the Catholic educator declared "it is almost an insult to human intelligence to regard Franco's rule over a weak and impoverished Spain as an immediate threat to world peace." He said the Spanish issue is being raised today "because of the duel between Russia and the western powers over the hegemony of Europe."

URGE HUMAN RIGHTS GUARANTEE

New York (RNS):—Guarantees of human rights, including those of freedom of religion and religious worship, should be included in the peace treaties to be negotiated in Paris by the big four foreign ministers, according to a statement sent by the committee on human rights to Secretary of State James F. Byrnes prior to his departure for France. The committee, which is part of the commission to study the organization of peace, cited the Moscow declaration regarding Italy which stated that "freedom of speech, of religious worship, of political belief, of the press, and of public meeting shall be restored in full measure to the Italian people."

These freedoms should be incorporated in all treaties, the committee's statement said, with the term "religious worship expanded to read "religion and religious worship." Incorporation of such rights and freedoms as are recognized by the United Nations also was suggested by the committee.

Among those signing the statement were Bishop Tucker, Presiding Bishop; Bishop Oxnam, president of the Federal Council of Churches; the Rev. Samuel M. Cavert, secretary of the Federal Council; the Rev. Henry Smith Leiper, American secretary of the World Council.

Mrs. Chester H. Kirby, newly elected president of the Auxiliary of Rhode Island, is a communicant of Grace Church, Providence. She is a graduate of the University of Iowa and has a doctorate from Radcliffe College

CONFERENCES OF WOMEN

Boston:—The first of four district all-day conferences of the women's division of the Church Service League were held April 25 and 30. The first was at Trinity, Concord, the other at St. Michael's, Milton. Following a corporate communion there were reports, discussions, and round table conferences on every phase of work. Presiding at the Concord meeting was Mrs. Harold C. Hart while Miss Mary A. Whitney was the leader at the Milton meeting.

Laymen Express Their Opinions On Worth of Church

Think That Organized Christianity Making Gains in Their Own Communities and World

By Arkansas Churchman's Association

Little Rock, Ark.:—The Episcopal Churchman's Association of the diocese of Arkansas recently conducted a layman's opinion poll. An analysis of the returns from eighty laymen in four parishes reveal interesting information.

All but 11 feel that churches are "essential" to a community; and those 11 feel that churches are "beneficial." Over half believe that the Episcopal Church either leads or equals other communions in their standing in the community; 23 think our Church is "missing many opportunities," and 7 feel it is "definitely lagging."

To the question, "Why do you go to church," 26 said it is "essential to my way of life," 14 go from a sense of duty, 33 enjoy it and are helped by it. Only one admitted that he goes because "my wife insists on it." The interesting thing is that most of them do go to church with regularity—although 9 claimed to need Sunday off for rest and recreation, while 2 go seldom because they do not find the services interesting.

Forty-seven value the Church and its teachings as essential to themselves—but only 41 thought it essential to their families. Under "beneficial," 32 place that valuation on the Church to themselves, but only 24 think it so for their families.

Nearly half of the men rate Sunday Morning Prayer as the most important service; over one-fourth give the early Communion Service first place; and 13 place the late Sunday Communion Service first. As to what features or parts of Sunday services should be most emphasized, the largest vote is for the Holy Communion, with the sermon in second place and the prayers third. Two feel that "a personal welcome" needs the most emphasis.

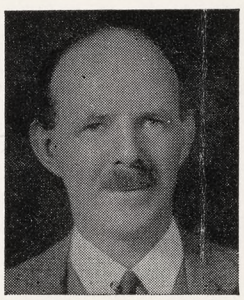
When it comes to sermon topics (each person indicating three preferences), the result was: 41 on everyday living; 37 on human relations; 32 on the Church's faith and practice; 22 on Church instruction; 26 on Bible texts (and we hope all sermons are on Bible texts). Only 6 prefer sermons on morals, 4 on current topics, 3 desire "evangelistic sermons."

As for developing our work in the rural areas of the diocese, nearly everybody thinks we should be more active in it, although 10 prefer just to keep on "as is" and one says let well-enough alone.

On the subject of foreign missions, only 8 are recorded as "against this type of work" (and most of them are in one parish). One is content to leave it to other Christian bodies. Everybody else is in favor of the overseas missionary program, and most of them favor the expansion of that program. The war changed the opinion of one-fourth of the men relative to foreign missions.

There are a number of things about their local parishes which do not appeal to these men—a few say it's too high or too low, and "too many old fogies running things." Many are concerned lest we fail to make sufficient appeal to young people. But most of the men—in good Episcopalian fashion — are "satisfied in general" with their Church.

The preponderant opinion is that organized Christianity is gaining ground in the communities represented in this poll, although a few feel that it is losing ground, particularly among youth. Also, there is strong opinion in favor of cooperation with other Church groups, working towards greater understanding and possible future Church unity for safeguarding the historic identity and fundamentals of the Episcopal Church. Eighteen men favor co-operation with those of similar beliefs, but want to leave the "wildcat" groups alone.



All in all, the poll is an interesting demonstration of the diversity of opinions within the Episcopal Church, yet all are bound together in unity of spirit and in the bond of peace. These laymen like their Church and attend it, support it, and work in it.

SUPREME COURT GIVES NEW RULING

Washington (RNS):—The Supreme Court ruled here that an alien who will not fight may become a citizen if he will serve in the army some other way. Five justices agreed that James Louis Girouard, 44-year-old Canadian-born engineer, of Stoneham, Mass., may take the oath of allegiance even though he has religious scruples against bearing arms. Three other judges dissented sharply.

Justice William O. Douglas spoke for the court in upsetting three famous cases which for more than fifteen years have been United States law. In all three the Supreme Court denied the oath of citizenship to persons who believed, like Girouard, that it is wrong to take up arms.

The question up to the Supreme Court in these cases, and in the Girouard case, was not whether an alien ought to have to promise to fight. It was whether Congress has by law required them to promise to do so. Three times in the past the court said the law does call for such a promise. Justice Douglas said flatly that all three decisions were wrong and that the true law was stated by the late Justice Oliver

Wendell Holmes, when he said: "If there is any principle of the Constitution that more imperatively calls for attachment than any other it is the principle of free thought—not free thought for those who agree with us but freedom for the thought that we hate. I think we should adhere to that principle with regard to admission into, as well as to life within this country."

MARRIAGE CONSIDERED BY YOUNG PEOPLE

Philadelphia: — Young people of several local parishes are to consider the subject of marriage at a series of four meetings starting this Sunday evening at St. Elizabeth's Church. Leaders are to be Dr. H. C. Wood, obstetrician at the Episcopal Hospital; Dr. H. S. Gaskill, psychiatrist at the hospital of the University of Pennsylvania; the Rev. Walter C. Klein of St. Mark's Church.

SISTER CHURCHES ARE AIDED

New York:—At a recent meeting of the National Council's committee on aid to sister Churches, the second quarterly installment of the Church's contribution was approved, and has since been forwarded. The amount is $154,170, making the total gift so far this year $308,340. Of the current installment, $95,000 is given through the Commission on World Council Service (World Council of Churches) and $40,000 through the Church Committee for Relief in Asia. Relatively small amounts were designated by donors, and disbursed in accordance with the designation.

Other agencies sharing in the gift included the International Missionary Council, American Bible Society, YMCA War Prisoners' Aid and Chaplaincy Commission, American Friends Service Committee, YWCA World Emergency Fund, World's Student Christian Federation, Indusco, Episcopal American Japanese Student Scholarship Aid.

LONG ISLAND LAYMEN TO MEET

Jamaica, N. Y.:—The laymen who have affiliated themselves with the Episcopal Evangelical Fellowship are meeting at Grace Church, Jamaica, for the latest in a series which started last fall when the Rev. Gardiner M. Day addressed them. The men will gather for evening prayer at 8 p.m. on May 14th, and thereafter assemble in the parish hall to hear Rev. John H. Fitzgerald, rector of Christ Church, Bay Ridge, and secretary of the diocesan convention, explain the working of the Hare Ballot, the method of voting adopted by the convention, and an address by Rev. Charles W. Hubon, rector of St. Mary's, Brooklyn, on the newly adopted apportionment of the missionary quota.

Many laymen have asked questions about the issues which are brought before convention and this will be an evening devoted to trying to answer them in order that delegates may be more familiar with the matters confronting them when they go to Garden City in May.

RICE DETERMINES SALARIES

New York:—Bishop Lloyd R. Craighill of Anking, China, writes the National Council that at the meeting of the House of Bishops of the Chinese Church in Shanghai, the bishops of the "American" diocese agreed on a new scale of salaries for the Chinese staff. The schedule ties the salaries to the price of rice. The Bishop gives as an example the newly adjusted salary of a Chinese priest, English-educated, with a wife and four children. He has a basic salary of $100 a month, in Chinese national currency, a bonus of $40,000, a rice bonus for two adults of $17,280, a rice bonus for four children of $51,840. Thus his total monthly income is $109,220 Chinese currency.

Lest Church people here should imagine that workers in China are extravagantly overpaid, Bishop Craighill explains that in American money this amounts to $55 a month.

BOSTON MEETINGS OF CLID

Boston:—The annual meeting of the Boston chapter of the Church League for Industrial Democracy was held last evening, May 1, at the Church of the Advent. There was a discussion of resolutions to be presented at the diocesan convention and also the General Convention. Also a good bit of time was devoted to the question of how a local chapter could work most effectively with the national office of the league.

On May 7 the annual pre-convention meeting of the CLID will be held at 5:30 at Trinity Church. The speaker is to be Prof. Harlow Shapley of Harvard, one of the world's authorities on astronomy and a contributor to the recent book on atomic energy, One World or None.

At the meeting on May 1 it was agreed that the primary issues before the people of the United States are the following, and in the order named: 1: Rational control and use of atomic energy fission. 2: The problem of maintaining fully cooperative relations with the Soviet Union. 3: The problem of our own internal economy in relation to maximum production, coupled with full employment of human resources, both quantitatively and qualitatively. 4: The problem of race relations and the struggle against economic and social, cultural and educational, discrimination.

Dr. Alexander Guerry, head of the University of the South, has been honored by being elected president of the Southern University Conference

CONVENTION OF IOWA

Waterloo, Iowa:—The Rev. Thomas V. Barrett, head of college work, and the Rev. George A. Wieland, head of domestic missions, are to be the headliners at the convention of the diocese of Iowa, meeting at Christ Church, here, May 14-15. Also addressing the Auxiliary will be Miss Helen Turnbull, director of Windham House, New York.

FRANK D. GIFFORD INTRODUCED

Philadelphia:—The Rev. Frank D. Gifford, dean elect of the Philadelphia Divinity School, was the headliner at a dinner on April 29. Others to speak were Bishop Oliver J. Hart and Dr. Thomas S. Gates, chairman of the board of trustees of the University of Pennsylvania.

Christ's Victory and Ours

THE fact of suffering is universal. To live is to suffer. The child is born amid suffering; the accidents of life entail suffering; and often—though not always—death is painful. The pessimist is right, so far. It is not certain, however, that the sorrows of life outweigh or outnumber its joys.

And so the fact of suffering is here anyway. It is not a problem created by religion. But it becomes a problem when men ask, How can God permit suffering? Or when they assert, If God really cared for us, He would certainly abolish suffering.

The problem of suffering is one that Christianity takes in utter seriousness. Instead of pretending that suffering is only an illusion, an "error of mortal mind," it points to the cross of Christ and says, See, God Himself takes suffering seriously, endures it, uses it for His purposes, and not only triumphs over it but brings good out of it. In this kind of a world, God Himself, entering into it, must face a cross. But He does so, and turns defeat into victory, suffering into joy, affliction into strength.

It is in union with Christ that the Christian finds the solution of the problem—not a merely theoretical solution, but the practical solution. His strength, like Christ's, "is made perfect in weakness" and "he learns obedience by the things which he suffers." In the furnace of affliction walk not only the three servants of God, but a fourth, the Son of God, enduring it with them. Out of it they come, redeemed and strengthened — to say the least, better men than they were before, with deeper understanding, more sympathy, purified character. The dross in human character is burned away in that furnace. "My son, if you would serve the Lord, prepare your soul for trial." That is the testimony of the saints, that is the message—one message—of the cross of Christ.

We do not live in a world where only Polyannas can be happy—that is, only those who ignore the realities of life. Nor do we live in a world where all can be happy as Polyannas. Instead, as a Roman Catholic writer has put it (in an article in the Atlantic), "This is a bitter-sweet universe." We are not here to taste and enjoy only sweet things, but also bitter, and to live fully, as men and women, to endure as well as to enjoy, and create as well as receive. "He who overcometh shall inherit these things"—or, in the new Revised Standard Version, "He who conquers shall have this heritage, and I will be his God and he shall be my son." These are the words of the One who said of his own dark prospects: "Be of good cheer; I have overcome the world." Suffering that is not merely endured, but positively embraced, for the sake of others, is creative. It produces something that was not there before, a deepening and enrichment of life that comes only from God, whose own Son "went not up to joy but first he suffered pain." Only those who have accepted their suffering, and have offered it to God, know what this means. The rest of us, who whimper and complain and wish we lived in some other kind of a world—we never discover those depths of living or feel the pulse of God, whose heart beats in the sorrow of the world, and who is "afflicted" with his people, "in all their affliction," and "the angel of whose presence saves them."

"QUOTES"

THE fundamental teachings of religion must be at the base of that essential harmony and mutual respect between men of all walks of life and of all creeds and faiths and races. Under these teachings there can be no "wrong side of the tracks" in our cities. Under these teachings we cannot point with pride to our churches and close our eyes to our slums. Under these teachings we cannot be smugly content with Sunday and church schools of all faiths, filled with one-half of our communities' children, and ignore the other half of our children who are not receiving any religious training or education whatsoever.

—Harold E. Stassen.

It Is Still True

"THERE are certain facts which should be frankly faced. If, in approaching the Presbyterians or any other Protestant communion, we expect in any way that they will admit that their ministry of the word and sacraments is invalid, then we shall be grievously disappointed. Considering the spiritual vitality, the missionary zeal, the deep religious experience of these communions, if we were in their place, we should feel exactly the same way. If we are to expect any such action on their part, we had better drop the discussion of unity in that direction at once.

Only misunderstanding, bitterness and disunity can result. If we are to demand re-ordination as a prerequisite of unity, then we should say so, and that will be the end of the matter, at least for our generation. Otherwise we are in the position of praying and talking about unity in large and vague terms without being able to agree about any definite steps to be taken. We hear much of our being a "bridge Church"; but as someone has said, the bridge is in mid-air, as neither terminus is on the ground. The position of the Roman Catholic Church is definite and clear. They do not engage in discussions of unity because they state without equivocation that they demand submission. If we are to do nothing until that position be changed, we shall wait a long time. If that is our attitude towards, let us say, the Presbyterian Church, let us make this plain. On the other hand, if we believe that no Church in a divided Christendom has all the blessings of the spirit of God, then we should be willing to take steps not only to make our contribution to others, but be ready to receive theirs in return.

"What I am asking for is a sincere and realistic statement of our own position. In the second place, it strikes me that important as the historic method of approach undoubtedly is, we must not forget that Christ promised the comfort and guidance of the Holy Spirit. We cannot feel absolutely bound even by the sacred past. Is it not possible that under new conditions God through Christ may lead us into new methods and paths?

"One excellent example of this is the whole debate between St. Peter and St. Paul regarding the binding force of the Jewish law. On the one hand, one can be sympathetic with the conservative position of the apostolic group at Jerusalem. To them the law was a covenant with God, hallowed by the practice of generations. On the other hand, St. Paul held that under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, the Church was called to a wider and more missionary task. No one of us can doubt but that the future of the Church was determined by St. Paul's victory. In other words, when we speak of prayer, it should mean the placing of ourselves unreservedly in the hands of God, who may have new revelations for his Church. Too often we come to God with our prejudices and convictions, and thus are not open to the guidance of his Spirit. The times which we confront seem to me as critical as those which confronted the apostles. In the determined advance and onslaught of world-wide paganism, we are forced to place first things first. This is an era which calls for visions, for courage, and for Christian statesmanship in the truest meaning of that phrase."

The above statement was made by Bishop Sherrill of Massachusetts in his convention address in 1940. The fact that it is as timely today does great credit to him, but little credit to our Church which has done so little to change the picture in the past six years.

Protestants and the Press

by Marjorie Hoagland

Churchwoman of New York

THE press is the world's most powerful media for reaching—and influencing—the minds of men; the Church is the agency with the world's most powerful message.

I am presuming to write on the subject of Protestants and the press because of the overwhelming present urgency of what the Church has to say and the necessity that every possible media be utilized, fully and adeptly. Perhaps—as a lover of Protestantism and as a veteran newsman—I am to some extent qualified to do liaison. Since graduating from journalism school in 1933 I have worked continuously in the field, writing for United Press, The Chicago Sun, The Louisville (Ky.) Courier-Journal, and for public relations and advertising agencies.

A reporter's job, as stated in the historic Rauschenbusch prayer still sometimes used when "30" is written to a newsman's career, is this—to so show forth the light that the people will not be confused; that they will not call the light, darkness; nor the darkness, light.

Essentially, that is Christ's purpose in the world, isn't it . . . to cause his people everywhere to know the light as light, and to turn away from the darkness because they recognize it to be darkness and evil.

Church representatives can help news and magazine writers to grasp the full, glorious potentialities of their tasks, i.e., their part in bringing in the kingdom.

Newsmen have mandate and precedence for assuming a basically religious view of their work; they need revitalization spiritually, which can come through contacts with Church representatives. They are even now the people's advocates, champions of freedom and democracy and defenders of the right; major writers always have recognized this. But it is hard to fulfill these responsibilities in a long-term way without the guiding and empowering spirit of God giving them a mighty sense of vocation; and the releasing fellowship of Christian minds.

How do Roman Catholics get the good press they do? Well, they're astute manipulators of press media, with know-how enough not to miss a trick of the trade; and, they work seriously at making friends among press people. These avenues are open—equally open—to Protestants.

A personal illustration will show part of what I mean. When on the United Press news bureau at Minneapolis I wrote a story about Catholicism's famed and lovely Baroness Maria von Trapp (of Trapp Family Choir note), who spoke there under the auspices of the Catholic Action Committee. A week or so later it was published in Red Letter, the UP national news-feature service, and automatically had a tremendous nation-wide pick-up. Now, I worked under difficulties in preparing the feature and, lacking some details, I phoned quite late in the evening, a Roman priest nearby. He was friendly, understanding, cooperative and supremely (and flatteringly) knowledgeable about my field. I gathered some well-assembled facts about the subject of the story, but mainly I gathered that this priest thought the press was the hope of the world and he was going to say a few "Hail Mary's" for me that night, yes indeed. The next day . . . unsolicited and bright and early . . . he appeared at my office with a well-written handout (the outstanding parts checked with a pencil for my guidance), a glossy photograph just the right size (8 by 12), a suggestion for transmitting my piece to The Catholic Digest for possible use because of its importance . . . these things, and a beaming smile and a hearty handshake.

I always have guarded closely my professional integrity by not allowing personal factors to influence unduly my handling of the news. Nor was I then (this was in 1943) churchly minded. But just the same, I kept my eye on the Trapp feature story to see that all went well with it.

What the Catholic priest did was entirely legitimate; he did an adequate press job for a spectacular member and for the CAC, and he propagandized for his faith.

Naturally, the Roman Catholics as well as the Protestants have information centers or services to process their news for the secular press—and they usually do a superb job. Stories reach newspapers and magazines in terse, pleasantly-written style, approved by officials and ready for use if the editors see fit to accept them. Editors are limited at present as to space but over a period of time they'll use some of this material. As it then appears under the guise of news, often quite properly, it exerts more influence on the reader than it would if it appeared as plainly a motivated release (i.e., publicity or propaganda). It also is true that Roman Catholics in editorial posts on newspapers and magazines often—perhaps usually—seem more aware of their Church's interests than do Protestants in like positions; they are informed and, by and large, they are concerned. In fairness to ourselves it should be emphasized that many individuals are called Protestants when they actually are non-church.

In New York, there is a Catholic Press Institute, itself news-making because it holds regular meetings with name speakers and these meetings are legitimate news. It's one of many ways by which liaison is maintained between the Roman Church and its members in press jobs. It is friend-making; it is informative. I wish Protestants had equal contacts with the great working press.

And I wish very much indeed, and shall pray continuously, that soon Protestants will give a measure of fellowship and support to news writers (magazine, column, etc.) who valiantly strive for worthy purposes, mindful of their responsibilities to the new one world which can be established under God—whether they are Protestant or Roman Catholic.

NOW, as to more specific suggestions, given not as final but merely as suggestive for further study—

Protestantism should man its information services at least partially with trained, experienced newsmen. A gigantic amount of Protestant news can be filtered into the secular press if it is written tersely and smoothly, and handled properly in presentation. This also is supremely true of the news-feature story. We must not overlook any longer the wide-open opportunities about us.

The information commission representing a united Protestant Church of, say 7,000,000 members can speak with considerable authority. It can exert a real influence for good. It must know how to do the job. Journalism is a big field and it takes long training to know how to function adequately in it.

Our message is God's message, or should be. We must answer some day for our custody of it.

One or two national or world bodies speaking for Protestantism should be empowered to do a big, over-all press job on important Protestant news. This should be handling comparable to that given a Papal encyclical.

These bodies should get all the financial and other support they need to do the job, and they should get it only as long as they keep several jumps ahead of their task. In public relations, it is necessary to get there "fustest with the mostest."

Protestantism will not maintain its position by retreating to an ivory tower and presuming that its worth will be recognized. It has authority to go into the market-place to fight for the minds of men; Christ himself commissioned his followers to go into the highways and byways. In short, to go where people are.

Information agencies should be supported adequately so that they can keep abreast of the times in use of media; picture-stories in books and magazines, illustrations, cartoons, movies, documentaries—the whole play. Christ's message deserves the whole play and after all, there are millions of people to be reached. Our effort must be adequate.

Let Church representatives, priests and laymen alike, make friends with members of the working press. Get to know them, their aims, problems and needs. Try to understand their motivations and, understanding them, to foster those which are Christian and long-term. Inform them fully of what goes on, keeping an eye on world activities and potentialities particularly. I never yet have known a reporter who wouldn't listen to an intelligent person who had something serious and worthwhile to say. They would resent it if they thought you wanted them to distort the news but not if they believed you merely wanted it reported truly.

Above all in the relationship, continue mindful that newsmen also are "our Father's children," with all the potentiality that implies and that—as it happens—they are so situated as to be peculiarly able to be bearers of his "good news."

"Would You Want Your Own Daughter . . ."

by Hugh D. McCandless

Of The Witness Editorial Board

ANYONE who makes the most modest statement about racial justice knows that this question will be asked of him. The questioner has made up his mind that if the answer is "yes", the speaker is unbalanced or untruthful, and he will listen no more; if the answer is "no", the speaker is inconsistent, and again he will listen no more. For all its apparent logic, the question is merely a convenient mental exit.

No one wants his daughter to marry into any race that is suffering from economic, social, political, or educational deprivations. No one would want his daughter to marry into any family—of any race—that was subject to such disadvantages, or who had been subject to them for generations. No one wants his children to have children who would be social outcasts. No one would want his daughter to marry a man crippled with a disease, whether that disease was the man's own fault or not. Why should anyone expect any father to wish his daughter married to a man crippled by financial and cultural sanctions, who would have to pass these on to his offspring?

When financial inequalities are done away, or reversed, the situation changes markedly. "Women of our kind" do get married to wealthy orientals, without losing caste. Their children often pay the price, by finding themselves barriered off from both ancestral cultures. But this need not happen if they gravitate to certain circles: religious, literary, musical, and so forth. The professional milieu is usually the one in which they find the rest of us least cruel.

Proof that economics is a most important factor is shown in the intermarrying of the American Indian with other races. Faced with a penetration of "whites" and "blacks" which was occasionally peaceful, they mixed with both. Social sanctions did enter into their choice between the two, but the things which determined which race they should or could blend with were usually matters of practicality. Pocahontas was the daughter of a "king" who was more important and powerful in Virginia than any man in the little English colony, and doubtless better endowed with this world's goods. There was no reason why she should not become Mrs. John Rolfe. Many white Americans boast of Indian blood, and the rest of us rejoice with them in this.

In places and at times when the Indians were comparatively poor and thus uncultured, they mixed with Negroes. Educational centers were often started for both, without drawing any line between them. That culture and prosperity are not completely integrated is obvious to anyone who reads certain "society columns," but this does not at all weaken the fact that a certain amount of prosperity for a considerable period of time is an essential to any degree of culture.

However, even if the present level and future opportunities of every American were evened up, general intermarriage would not immediately become the order of the day. Our minds have become conditioned by inherited judgments to such a degree that the idea of mere attraction between people of certain different races appalls us for the simple reason that it seems preposterous. White missionaries serve among unclothed natives without a qualm. There are, indeed, other couriers of our civilization, and muck-raking authors go to great pains to describe their amatory adventures. The rate at which such literature sells bears no relation to its veracity. Even in these books, however, such experiences are treated as adventures, brought on by an acceptance of the violence of frontier life and a revolt against its boredom. Marriage itself is an adventure, but of a different sort, and there is little resemblance between these casual experiments and the great commitment of marriage.

As successive waves of immigrants have come to our shores, and as they have succeeded in adjusting themselves to this way of life and in contributing to it, more and more parents have watched their sons and daughters marry "foreigners" of one sort or another. These parents become fearful of the future—not without some reason, and fear is the occupational disease of any normal parent—and their emotion is heightened by their anger at the interloper and at their reckless offspring. There seems to be something ungrateful about flouting parental prejudices, and so parental pride is hurt two ways.

I KNOW of no statistics about the comparative permanency of such matches, but I should say it was at least as good as the average. The main hurdle is not in the attitudes, actions, and assertions of the partners themselves, but in those of their older relatives. I dread maiden aunts whose feelings must be considered when there is to be a mixed marriage. Otherwise, as far as I know, the main danger in a marriage of people of different faiths is the giving up of the practice of religion. No one likes to go to church alone, and this is especially true of married people. In the attempt to keep religion from being a barrier between them (spare the mark!) people often succeed in making it an empty gap between them, and chasms are sometimes more dangerous than walls. I had rather see either convert the other, than have both lose regular contact with the things that are eternal. My business is souls, not rules.

The permanency of a marriage is not always a sign of its value. The basic test of marriage is whether it helps the partners grow spiritually. But permanency is the only measurable criterion we have.

Religion, however, is not as great a barrier as pigment. The slant of the soul is considered nothing compared to the slant of the eye. Protestants, Catholics, and Jews have lived within a stone's throw (literally!) of each other for centuries. It rains a lot in Europe, and we are all pale or pink. It is the thought of marrying into more exotic groups, even though they be our co-religionists, that gives us pause. We don't know them very well. Is their race pure? How many blood lines would a single union introduce into our heredity?

One thing may be mentioned here. It is not proved, and would not change things much if it were. The people of Northwestern Europe are possibly not all pure Homo Sapiens. There may be a strain of Homo Neanderthalensis in us. If this is so, we are certainly the least "pure" of human races.

"At least, we have tried to keep our possible impurities among ourselves," you may reply. Of course we have. As long as there are plenty of people of our tint and type, our instincts will make us select them. But races tend to develop into types by isolation, and isolation for humanity has disappeared.

Those who face the prospect of having an interracial posterity with no enthusiasm may rest assured. By the time the races mix probably none of the readers of this will have any posterity. I do not refer to the cosmic possibilities of the misuse of atomic force. I am thinking of a stronger force—a biological one.

Statistics showed, a generation ago, that the average Yale graduate had 1.7 children. The average Vassar graduate had 1.1. At the same time it was estimated that there would not be a single surviving descendant of the present body of Harvard graduates in five hundred years. Aristocracy tends not to reproduce itself. The war may have slowed this trend but it will not change it. If you were intelligent enough and well enough educated to understand that the first of the statistics I have just quoted does not mean that every Yale man has one complete child and one incomplete one, you are probably an artistocrat, and your line will pretty certainly die out before it becomes hybridized.

The meek shall inherit the earth. The ancestors of the humanity of the future are now playing in the alleys of the slums of the seaports of the world. Their ancestry is very mixed and they are very fertile. Let them worry; it is out of your hands and it will not bother them much if at all. Our earliest mammalian ancestors squeaked unnoticed about the feet of the immense and lordly dinosaurs. It was their insignificance that saved them.

This does not mean that you have no problem. Increasing democratization will bring increasing intermarriage. The danger of intermarriage will be greater if you want to put it that way. But is the real danger of intermarriage that it shall happen or that it will be unsuccessful or unhappy? If it becomes more common its chances should be better.

Your progeny may play no part in the really mixed marriages of the future; but your attitude can do much to build or destroy the spiritual values of the mixed marriages that have been contracted in this your own day. Prejudice and false fears cannot help the situation in any way.

Missionary Prayer Book

By

DuBOSE MURPHY
Rector at Tuscaloosa, Alabama

WE HAVE thought long and spoken much of the wonderful heritage that we have in our incomparable liturgy. We have been comforted by the blessings which have come to us through our worship, and we appreciate the occasional remarks of our friends: "The Episcopal service is so beautiful." But it does not occur to many of us to wonder why this beauty does not draw more people through our worship to actual membership. We do not realize that most of these visitors look on with an admiration diluted by bewilderment. They do crave the beauty and order and reverence of our services; but they do not know how to find the places.

In other words, it is not a missionary book and we are not a missionary Church. It is true that we have a splendid missionary organization and do much mission work. But we do not base our worship on missionary principles; that is, we do not set our liturgy to the important task of winning those outside our own membership. Our book is written for the initiate. It began its life (as the English Prayer Book) in a community which was almost entirely composed of members of one Church. There was no need that it should be missionary, for parish and community were practically the same thing. But times have changed. Our Church is now not even the most prominent branch of Christianity in the community, and our book does not even contemplate the presence of strangers within our gates. And so we forfeit a priceless missionary opportunity.

Recent revisions and proposed revisions of the book have made matters worse by providing so many alternatives, so many variable and optional elements in the services, that even the experienced worshipper has some difficulty in keeping up with the minister. We have gained richness and flexibility but we have lost the appeal of certainty and dependability.

I do not propose another complete revision; but I do suggest that we make an attempt to offer a Mission Pray Book,—just as we have a Mission Hymnal. Such a book would differ chiefly in its arrangement, with most of the alternative and optional matter relegated to an appendix. For example:

A. In the order for daily morning or evening prayer,
   1. Print only one or two opening sentences, with a rubric permitting "other appropriate verses of scripture."
   2. Print only the shorter exhortation and one declaration of absolution.
   3. Omit all "invitatories" and, where a canticle may be used, print only one.
   4. Omit the Nicene Creed.
   5. Group together in an appendix the other opening sentences, canticles, etc.

B. In the order for holy communion,
   1. Re-write in clear and simple language the rubric concerning the collect, epistle, and gospel.
   2. Remove all offertory sentences and proper prefaces to an appendix.

C. In all services, print the rubrics, as suggestions and guides for the worshipper, in such type as will invite reading rather than skipping.

D. Add an Order of Worship which may be used on certain occasions, by authority, with clear and simple directions. To shorten morning or evening prayer by omitting one lesson and one canticle only makes for confusion; so much will be left out that the visitor will not know what is going on. For mission services or such occasions as confirmation, there should be an order in which finding the places and turning of pages would be reduced to a minimum.

As I hope the reader will see I am not proposing a revision of the Book of Common Prayer. What I feel that we need is a book which the visitor, the child, and the inexperienced worshipper may use without too great a feeling of confusion. In particular I want to see our Church commend its manner of worship to the stranger within our gates. "How shall he that filleth the place of the unlearned say the Amen at thy giving of thanks seeing he knoweth not" how to find the places?

The Churches in Columbia Plan Racial Cooperation

Meetings Between White and Negro Clergy To Be Held at Regular Intervals in Future

Edited by Sara Dill

Columbia, Tenn.: — A first-hand account of the racial troubles of this Southern town were presented in THE WITNESS for March 21, written by the Rev. Joseph G. Moore, on the faculty of Seabury-Western, who went there to make a first-hand investigation. We have now received a letter from the Rev. W. Fred Gates, Jr., rector of St. Peter's, Columbia, in which he presents something of what the churches have been doing since the trouble.

"On April 10th twenty members of the Woman's Auxiliary of St. Peter's Church visited the Negro Church of the Holy Comforter here. This was the result of an invitation from the women of the latter church. Also present were Bishop E. P. Dandridge, the Rev. Charles Johnson who is in charge of the church, and myself. The three of us made short talks. The work of the Negro congregation was discussed and its plans for the future outlined by members of the Negro congregation. A free will offering of sixty-eight dollars was turned over to the Church of the Holy Comforter. Refreshments were served. The church is situated on one corner of the block known as Mink Slide, which was the scene of most of the trouble.

"I am president of the county ministers association. Acting in that capacity I called a meeting of the white and Negro clergy of Columbia. All denominations were represented including the Roman. There was a thorough and frank discussion of our racial problems, and the result was that a committee was appointed to plan and prosecute projects calling for cooperation between the races.

"This committee met a week later. Three decisions were made. First, that the meetings between the white and Negro clergy should continue at regular intervals, with the possibility of including laymen of both races in later meetings, and with the hope that this body might become an organized interracial commission. Second, it was decided to work for the erection of a new Negro high school here. It is badly needed. The county school board within the past month has authorized the construction of it. Our purpose here is to create the public opinion that will carry it through as soon as possible. Third, it was decided to work for a hospital to serve the needs of Negroes in Columbia and the surrounding area. We have made plans to solicit the advice of medical authorities in determining the actual needs and the kind of facilities needed to meet them. After this is done, we shall then go on to see what we can do about finding the means to erect and operate such a hospital as is needed.

If we find that we can work together successfully in getting results along the lines I have indicated, we shall then go on to face other problems existing between the races.

Women Ministers

Toronto, Canada (RNS):—Like the old saddlebag preachers of a century ago, 23 girls now in training in United Church colleges are to go out this summer into Canadian frontier territory to do the work of ministers. They will travel on horseback, on bicycles, in buggies, and a few of them in old motor cars. Six are taking the theology course and hope before long to be ordained ministers. The United Church, which is the only large Protestant body in Canada to admit women to the ministry, now has about a dozen of them working on fields scattered throughout the dominion.

"We used a few girls in this summer activity and we found that they did splendid work," said the Rev. M. C. Macdonald of the home mission department. "The girls will be on fields in the prairie provinces, British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario, and possibly the maritimes. They will have from two to eight preaching points on their charges. Most of them will preach three times a Sunday."

The girl preachers will organize and conduct Sunday schools, look after vacation camps and schools, do pastoral visitation and conduct funerals. On many of their fields there are no churches. They will use halls or schoolhouses for their Sunday services. Occasionally the missions superintendent will call on them and conduct a communion service.

Another Nobes

Ventnor, N. J.:—John Christopher Nobes was born on April 2. He is the son of missionaries, the Rev. and Mrs. Clifford E. B. Nobes of All Saints' Mission, Bontoc, Philippines.

New Parish House

Binghamton, N. Y.:—Trinity Church here is to launch a campaign on May 12 for $100,000 for a new parish house. To this the $25,000 received from insurance on the former building destroyed by fire will be added, enabling the parish to erect and equip a $125,000 structure.

Acolytes Festival

Utica, N. Y.:—Acolytes from parishes throughout the diocese of Central New York held the annual festival at Calvary Church here the evening of April 28th. The preacher was the Rev. Carl A. Aveilhe, rector of St. George's, Utica.

Pleads for Peace

Boston:—Bishop Sherrill, preaching at Trinity Church in Holy Week, pleaded for as great an effort toward total peace as we exerted for total war. Total peace is not being talked of as was total war; the present state of affairs is half-hearted.

Dr. Guerry Honored

Sewanee, Tenn.: — Dr. Alexander Guerry, head of the University of the South, was recently elected president of the Southern University Conference. There are forty-six colleges affiliated with the group.

EEF to Meet

Louisville, Ky.:—A conference of the Episcopal Evangelical Fellowship is to meet at Christ Church Cathedral here, May 7-8, at which issues to come before General Convention will be discussed. Bishop Scarlett of Missouri and the Rev. Oscar Seitz, professor at Bexley Hall, will speak on the marriage canon, with Dean Emerson of Cleveland presiding. Unity with Presbyterians will be handled by the Rev. Sherman E. Johnson, professor at the Episcopal Theological School, and the Rev. Charles D. Kean, rector at Kirkland, Mo. Dean Sweet of St. Louis will be the chairman.

Bishop Hines of Texas will be in the chair when the place of the evangelical in the Church is presented by the Rev. J. Clemens Kolb, chaplain of the University of Pennsylvania, and the Rev. William Marmion, rector of St. Mary's, Birmingham, Ala. Bishop Tucker of Ohio and the Rev. Frank Caldwell, president of the Presbyterian Seminary at Louisville, will be the dinner speakers, with Bishop Clingman of Kentucky presiding.

Similar conferences are to be held later in Washington, D. C. and in San Francisco.

Iowa Laymen

Marshalltown, Iowa:—The Rev. Arnold M. Lewis, national director of laymen's work, was the speaker at the annual meeting of laymen of the diocese of Iowa, meeting here at St. Paul's, April 27-28. Other speakers were Bishop Elwood L. Haines and Mr. Byron Pinney, the president of the organization.

To Visit Alaska

Davenport, Iowa:—Bishop Elwood L. Haines and Mrs. Haines are to visit Alaska in June to make a survey of work there for the National Council. They are to travel by plane, first to Seattle and then to Fairbanks. The trip will cover every mission and institution in the district, all the travelling to be by air. The survey will take about two months.

Bible Facts

New York:—Here are a few Bible facts, sent in by a reader, though whether he dug them up himself he did not reveal: 3,586,473 letters, 31,373 verses, 775,693 words, 1,189 chapters, 66 books. Longest book, Psalms; shortest book, John two. Longest chapter, 119 psalm; shortest chapter, 117 psalm. Longest verse, Esther, chapter 8 and 9; shortest verse, John, chapter 2, verse 35. You can check yourself if you don't believe him.

Bishop to Speak

Orangeburg, S. C.: — The convention of the diocese of South Carolina is to be held here, May 14-15, with Bishop Oliver J. Hart of Pennsylvania the guest speaker at the convention dinner.

Sisters Honored

Boston:—Sister Isabel, soon to return to China, Sister Anita Mary, and Sister Helena, a native of China, all of the Order of St. Anne, were the guests of honor at the annual meeting of the Church Periodical Club held at the diocesan house, April 23. Sister Anita Mary is the granddaughter of the first Bishop Boone, niece of the second Bishop Boone and daughter of the Shanghai missionary, Dr. Boone. All three had been imprisoned in the Philippines for four years after having been evacuated from China as a measure of safety. Mrs. Laurence Pope, diocesan director of the club, presided.

Paper Urges Purge

Budapest (wireless to RNS):—Recent reports of an alleged conspiracy by Catholic schoolboys to blow up Russian war monuments in Budapest with hand grenades brought a demand here by the Communist newspaper Szabad Nepd (Free People) that priests be purged from schools and religious instruction abolished in state schools.

"If priests explain the gospel with hand grenades and guns, the masses will explain the Bible to priests in their own way," Szabad Nepd declared.

Joseph Cardinal Mindszenthy, Archbishop of Esztergom, has ordered an investigation into the supposed conspiracy. Those said to be involved in the plot were students of a boarding school run by the Piarists, a Roman Catholic teaching congregation.

The headmaster of the school later declared that the "plot" was "no more than a boyish prank" which the communists used in their attack on Roman Catholic schools as "hotbeds of reaction."

Easter in Japan

Toyko (wireless to RNS):—Thousands of Christians in Japan, Korea, and the Ryukyu Islands participated in Easter celebrations. Highlighting holiday observances was the service in Tokyo's Meiji Stadium attended by 3,000 Protestant soldiers, sailors, and civilians, and a group of Japanese Christians. The service featured music of the First Cavalry Band and the singing of Easter hymns by a united choir of GI's and Japanese led by the Rev. Ugo Nakada. The sermon was preached by Chaplain Ival Bennet, chief of chaplains in General MacArthur's command.

A Roman Catholic service was held in Hibiya Hall, downtown Tokyo, with an attendance of over 2,000. Services were also conducted in all military installations.

In Korea, Protestant troops attended a sunrise service in the open court of a former Shinto shrine above Seoul which now serves as a music conservatory and Christian museum. The preacher was Chaplain V. P. Jaeger of the 24th Corps. Roman Catholic military personnel were present at a Mass in the Seoul cathedral, while other Easter services were held in various churches throughout the capital.

Most significant of all the Far Eastern services were those on Okinawa where a year ago 50,000 Al-

Why Such a Rush?

When we suggest that you order your Bundle for General Convention as early as this we do so for two reasons:

1. The Convention is early in September. Order now so that you will not neglect it during the summer.

2. There are still paper shortages and so we will be limited in the number of copies we can print. We will enter the orders as they are received—first come, first served. As we plan things at the moment there will be five General Convention Numbers, one a Pre-Convention Number giving valuable information about the Convention questions, places to visit, etc. This will be followed by four numbers giving complete reports of the Convention.

Churches Back OPA

Washington (RNS): — Congressman Adolph Sabath (D.-Ill.) speaking in favor of maintaining the Office of Price Administration without any amendments, read to Congress a long list of Church leaders and organizations who have endorsed extending the agency's life. Among them were the Church League of Industrial Democracy, the Methodist Federation for Social Service, Council of Social Action of the Congregational-Christian Churches.

Collects Relief

Washington (RNS): — Depots for collection of clothing, tinned foods, and money for purchase of additional foodstuffs to be shipped to Europe were set up at the Washington Cathedral here Sunday, April 28, it was announced by Canon George J. Cleaveland, chairman of the cathedral's relief committee. Members of the cathedral staff already have launched a drive to collect the amount necessary to purchase a heifer—some $150—which will be shipped from the United Church Relief Center at New Windsor, Md., as will all other food collected.

In the collection of foodstuffs, the newly-appointed cathedral committee will place special emphasis on obtaining foods for infants and young children, the canon stated, adding that canned fruits and fruit juices, dry and evaporated milk, cereals, and prepared vegetables all fall into this category.

Votes for Negroes

Atlanta, Ga.:—Gov. Ellis Arnall's appeal that the people of Georgia grant voting rights to Negroes was commended in a resolution passed by the Georgia Council of Church Women at its annual meeting here. The Council also called for a return to rationing as the best means of solving the world food crisis. The Council's action on the Negro question followed a speech by O. P. Gilbert, editor of the Christian Index, Georgia Baptist Convention publication, who questioned the wisdom of permitting all Negroes to vote.

"I do not believe we should make any distinction at the polls on the basis of color," Gilbert said, "but I think the franchise should be based on the intelligence of the people . . . I'm wondering if the Negro, as a whole, is capable of voting intelligently. The Negro is an emotional man. For a time he will be concerned with paying off and getting even at the polls."

In adopting a resolution asking Georgia Congressmen to support extension of the OPA, the Council said the OPA offers "the most practical means of preventing disastrous price increases which would disrupt the process of reconversion and bring untold suffering to large numbers of our people."

Bishop Transfers

New York (RNS):—Bishop Alexis, formerly of the Russian Orthodox diocese of Alaska, has transferred his allegiance to the Moscow Patriarchate, according to an announcement here. The bishop was previously under the jurisdiction of Metropolitan Theophilus, head of the dissident Russian Orthodox Church in North America which has consistently refused to recognize the jurisdiction of the Moscow Patriarch and is still regarded as schismatic.

Explaining his decision, Bishop Alexis said the action was based upon belief that "our Russian Orthodox Church is part of the whole Eastern Church," and that "in order to be in unity with the Eastern Or-

Book of Worship

Philadelphia (RNS): — A revised and enlarged Book of Common Worship for the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. has been published here by the denomination's board of Christian education. Prepared by a special committee set up in 1941, the book is said to express more adequately the standards of the Presbyterian Church than the service books hitherto published by the Church. The new Book of Common Worship follows the ordinal of the Church of Scotland and embodies features of service books of the Presbyterian Church in South Africa, the United Church of Canada, and the Evangelical and Reformed Church. New additions include suitable services for young people and children.

Five new orders of morning worship have been introduced in the present Book. In addition, there are five services for evening worship whereas the old book had but one evening service. The litanies have been changed "to meet more directly the needs of contemporary life." Other new material appears in the forms and orders of church ordinances.

Internationalism

Geneva (RNS):—The commission on a just and durable peace, American church-sponsored organization, has been invited by the World Council of Churches to supervise the first meeting of a newly-formed commission on international relations. The meeting, which is scheduled for August, probably will be held in or near London, but the exact place has not yet been defnitely decided. The commission on international relations was set up in February by the provisional committee of the World Council of Churches "to stimulate the Churches of all nations to a more vigorous expression of the demands of the Christian conscience to the political policies of governments."

Ecumenical Institute

Geneva (wireless to RNS): — The World Council of Churches has signed a five-year lease on the Chateau Dobossey at Celigny, lakeside village 17 kilometers from Geneva, which will become the headquarters of a new ecumenical institute to train Christian laymen. The institute is being financed through a gift of $1,000,000 from John D. Rockefeller, Jr. Chateau Dobossey, which can house sixty or seventy persons, was formerly used as a woman's college. Several important gatherings of Christian leaders are expected to be held there this summer, including a meeting of the general committee of the World Student Christian Federation, and a conference of the CIMADE, French Christian youth organization.

The ecumenical institute will provide courses of study for young laymen, especially from European countries. The first course will open next October and will run until December. Robert C. Mackie, general secretary of the World Student Christian Federation, heads the committee in charge. At its first meeting here, the committee increased its membership by the addition of Tracy Strong, general secretary of the YMCA; and Ruth Woodsmall, general secretary of the YWCA.

Chaplains Released

Washington (RNS):—The number of chaplains released from active duty since last September 1 totaled 3,660 on February 28, 1946, according to a report issued here by Maj. Gen. Luther D. Miller, chief of army chaplains. The report stated that the number of chaplains now on duty with the army totals 4,481.

There were 77 chaplains killed in action, including 12 lost in the sinking of Japanese prison ships and one killed during the bombing of Germany, according to the report, while 76 chaplains died from non-battle action, including five who died in Japanese prison camps. 1,383 chaplains have received 1,826 decorations since Pearl Harbor, the report stated.

End Discrimination

Richmond, Va.:—The Fellowship of Southern Churchmen, an interdenominational, interracial group, has called on Churches of all creeds to "break down those customs and mores which perpetuate hostility and invite conflict." A meeting of the fellowship here attended by whites and Negroes from 16 southern states adopted a resolution against the "present and prevalent separation of and discrimination against people on the basis of color, race and social status."

It challenged churches, synagogues and cathedrals to "join us in combatting the evil designs of the vendors of hate and distrust who would set man against man, playing upon his pride, his pretensions to power, his economic insecurity, his political fears and his religious sectarianism."

The resolution also called on all "people of goodwill" to seek the defeat of "any legislative measure such as the May-Johnson bill, which intends to control and exploit atomic energy for destructive purposes, and to support those measures, such as the McMahon bill, which intends to make possible the constructive employment of nuclear fission."

Force Justified

New York (RNS):—Protestantism's attitude toward the use of force has made the foreign policies of Great Britain and the United States "soft," Harry D. Gideonse, president of Brooklyn College, declared here. Gideonse, speaking at the Columbia University conference on religion, said the Protestant tradition that force in itself is wrong has led both countries to the point where they have nothing to back up their ideals. He added that Roman Catholicism and Judaism have been more realistic in their conception of force.

Asserting that conflicts on moral issues are first resolved by force and then codified by law, Gideonse said this doctrine does not mean that "might makes right" because force should be used only as an establishing tool of the "right." As an example, Gideonse cited the U. S. Civil War and the League of Nations. He pointed out that the North won the Civil War because its ideals were backed by strength, but the League failed because of its weaknesses.

Increase Attendance

Atlantic City, N. J. (RNS):—Constant emphasis on enrollment and attendance, increased promotional work and the active help of the bishops and church leaders were the factors responsible for the 1945 rise in attendance and enrollment in the Methodist Church, according to J. Q. Schisler, executive secretary of the denomination's general board of education. In a statement delivered before the Council of Bishops here, Schisler pointed out that church school enrollment and attendance is one of the major points of the Methodist Crusade for Christ now in progress throughout the Church. Enrollment last year jumped 96,685 and attendance 93,386. Promotional plans to continue this trend include closer work with the more than 40,000 church school superintendents, Schisler said. He added that a nation-wide conference of these leaders may be held soon.

Foreign Students

New York:—The influx of foreign students into this country, curtailed during the war years, has resumed with 10,445 enrolled for 1945-46 in institutions of higher education, according to the annual census made by the committee on friendly relations among foreign students, an interdenominational group sponsored by the YMCA. Largest number of students have come from Canada, which has a total of 1,613 as against 852 for the preceding year. China is second, with 1,298. Continuing a marked trend of recent years is the growth in the number from Latin America with 4,638 registered for the year. There are foreign students in every state, and they are registered in 738 different institutions, the report pointed out.

Fight Discrimination

Minneapolis (RNS): — A council of human relations, headed by a clergyman, has been created by Mayor Hubert H. Humphrey to provide leadership in the development of anti-discriminatory legislation. The council will seek to co-ordinate and help strengthen existing programs now sponsored by organizations interested in the human relations field and to develop a positive program of its own for the encouragement of better relations among the various sections of the community.

A survey will be made by the council to determine extent, degree, and location of prejudices and discriminatory practices as a basis for a program to be worked out with churches, schools, social welfare agencies, and other public groups.

Public Relations

Washington (RNS): — The public is 25 years behind in its conception and understanding of the practices and beliefs of the modern church, Ralph Stoody, director of the commission on public information of The Methodist Church, declared here. Speaking at the annual convention of the American public relations association, Stoody asserted that the churches, to a large extent, were at fault for this attitude because of their negligent public relations program.

"The unfamiliar phrases used by clergymen complicate the common man's understanding of what the Church is doing," Stoody said. He advocated a revision of the vocabulary used by churchmen so that the man in the street will have a clear picture of the Churches' work.

Letter from China

New York:—Writing to the National Council from St. Faith's School, Yangchow, China, Miss Althea Bremer said: "The city gates, the crowds, the rics, the wheelbarrows, the great city wall, the rutty lanes, they were all the same, and when we came within view of St. Faith's red-tiled roof I could discern no difference from the outside . . . But inside . . . More than half of the beautiful trees are gone, pines, elms, red maples, mulberry, magnolia, wu-tung (source of tung oil). The school building has suffered no great structural damage so far as I know, but lacks outside doors, inside walls, locks, windows and furnishings, besides being too filthy for any language.

"Before we left all the valuable equipment of the school and of the house, pianos, organ, laboratory, library and office equipment, guest hall furniture chapel and chancel furniture, had been placed in the school attic and sealed with false walls, but not a vestige remains except a few of the carved chapel benches, a guest hall chair, a tea stand or two, a damaged electrolux.

"One pleasant surprise was that when two of the staff broke through the ceiling of the residence porch into the eaves they found everything that we had hidden there, linen, dishes, rattan chairs, mattresses,

Miss Bremer intimated that when money is forthcoming for reconstruction, major repairs will be made, and it is hoped they can be finished in time to reopen St. Faith's in the autumn.

Curtailed Meals

Buffalo, N. Y. (RNS):—Members of Delaware Avenue Baptist church, largest church of its denomination in the city, have adopted a "concrete plan to implement their sympathies for starving peoples." More than 100 families have agreed to serve "curtailed meals" every Friday evening, the savings to go to war victims. They hope to raise $5,000 by this method within a year.

The idea grew out of a sermon several weeks ago by the Rev. Lee J. Beynon, pastor, who suggested his members "do something concrete to help the hungry." A few days later Mrs. Beynon trimmed the dinner menu to an omelet and a slice of bread and suggested that a "curtailed meal" be served in their home every Friday evening to carry out her husband's suggestion. At the next midweek prayer meeting other families pledged to do the same thing.

A family of four can save about $1 a meal by eliminating meat and soup or dessert, Beynon estimates. Several bachelor members who live in hotels or clubs save by substituting a milk shake for their regular lunch. Savings are placed in special envelopes at monthly communion collections.

REV. JAMES P. BURKE
Hendersonville, North Carolina

Is the Anglican Communion to be judged by what it is sometimes or even "often called?" Dr. Wedel in his article Anglicanism: Center of Unity says it ". . . has often been called a 'bridge Church'." The real question is not what it is often called, but rather what is it? I am reminded of the young lady who asked the rector if the Episcopal Church believed in dancing. The rector very properly replied: "It is not in the creed." I never learned that the word "bridge" was one of the notes of the Church, one of the words describing the true nature of the Church. Any argument, therefore, that is built on that assumption lacks force. "The Church is described in the creeds as one, holy, catholic, and apostolic"—Office of Instruction page 291 in the Prayer Book. Let's start on those notes!

CANON ANSON PHELPS STOKES JR.
Rector, St. Andrew's Cathedral, Honolulu

THE WITNESS is my chief contact with what is going on in the Church and it is great. I appreciate it more than I have ever appreciated it before.

The other day there was a news item about the convention of Michigan at which a report suggesting standard salaries for all clergy, with differentials for family, length of service, etc. was presented and turned down. Probably it should be done experimentally on a diocesan basis first before any national planning is done. Perhaps conditions vary too much for any national planning. However if it could be tried in some dioceses my impression is that after awhile those dioceses would have a spirit and morale that would make them outstanding and in them the Episcopal Church would soon become a grass-roots Church reaching effectively the smaller communities as it rarely does at present.

I am the kind of rector who would get hit by it and would most likely be cautious about encouraging it, but my conscience tells me that all is not right at present and that salaries should be on some such basis as the Michigan report recommended. At any rate I think THE WITNESS could help the cause by publishing a fuller summary of the report and perhaps getting articles written on the subject.

Canon Wedel is to be congratulated on the honesty of his article, Anglicanism: Center of Unity. He avoids the hypocrisy of speaking as though the Episcopal Church can surrender a great part of what is commonly considered its "catholic" heritage, and remain at the same time a "bridge Church." He envisions a great ecumenical movement of a pan-protestant type, and is willing to pay the price.

With equal honesty, I must say that the article made me uneasy. Reading between the lines I gather that Canon Wedel is reconciled to the likelihood of a fairly extensive defection on the part of the Anglo-Catholics if certain principles, such as the unique nature of the historic episcopate, are abandoned. But I think he divides Episcopalians too neatly into "protestants" and "catholics." I suspect there are many members of the Church, who, like myself, value it precisely because it is a bridge Church, and who are unwilling to be pigeon-holed. I think of myself as just a plain Episcopalian. I developed a genuine interest in Christianity only recently, and had to go about the business of deciding on a Church rather cold-bloodedly. I decided on the Episcopal Church because it seemed to me that it alone of the Churches I was familiar with had retained the essential values of primitive catholicism and eliminated the later corruptions. In other words, at the time of the Reformation it threw out the bath-water, and cherished the baby. And I don't regard the historic episcopate and the interpretation of Holy Communion as something more than a memorial as bath water!

If a union with the Presbyterians can be worked out whereby the historic episcopate is preserved, and freedom of interpretation and ritual is safeguarded for all groups within the Church is assured, then there is much to be said for the venture. But if such a union would involve (let us speak frankly) recognizing Presbyterian ordination, as it now exists, as equivalent to episcopal ordination, then our organic link with the primitive Church is lost, and the anchors are up. I'm afraid that the final result would be this: the Episcopal Church (or the combined Church) would cease to attract people who genuinely want the best features of catholicism and protestantism—many of them would be driven to Rome instead. And, though I cannot speak for the Anglo-Catholics, I fear there is grave danger that many parishes would refuse to take part in any adventure in union which committed the Church irrevocably to protestantism (and nothing else).

The growth of the Episcopal Church has been slow but sound. I'm afraid that in the frenzy for Christian unity day after tomorrow we may destroy the future usefulness of the Episcopal Church, as a genuine meeting place and reconciliation of two great Christian traditions.

The Easter number of THE WITNESS was so fine that I want to congratulate the editors. The article by Hugh McCandless on Where Are the Dead was a relief after reading nonsense on this subject all my life. I only wish that it might be put in leaflet form for wide distribution. I am sure rectors would be glad to have such a leaflet to place in the hands of many people who doubtless come to them for light in this matter. The poem by Douglas Sampson was also exceptionally fine—moving and convincing.

New Methods in Biblical Interpretation Imperatively Needed

Legend identified the lost tribes of Israel with Jacob's beloved wife, Rachel. But on the other hand, the patriarch's unloved wife, Leah, was the legendary ancestress of post-exilic Jewish writers through whom the Bible has come to us. These writers' treatment of the "Tabernacle in the Wilderness" is most remarkable and arresting:

The chief architect is a descendant of Leah. The leading donors of equipment are descended from Leah. The Tabernacle is entirely surrounded by descendants of Leah, preventing approach by Ephraimites, the sons of Rachel. Sacrifice on behalf of Israel may be offered only by priests descended from Leah. The position of honor, facing the sunrise, is held by the Leah-tribe of Judah with other Leah-tribes. But the Rachel-descended Ephraimites are ignominiously stationed on the west, or back, side of the camp. The march through the desert is headed by Judah and other Leah-tribes, to which are attributed the greatest military power; while the Ephraimites, to whom is attributed far less fighting strength, march in the rear.

On the other hand, in actual, objective history before the Exile, the Ephraimites (descended from Rachel through Joseph) are protected by Judah from the deadly enemy Edom. The tribe of Judah is wedged in between Ephraim on the north, and Edom on the south. And this pattern of authentic history is followed by legend: "Jacob sent messengers . . . unto the land of Edom; and the messengers returned saying, Esau cometh with four hundred men. . . . Then Jacob divided the people into two bands. . . . And he put Rachel and Joseph hindermost", — in the safest position, farthest from the approaching Edomites.

(An interesting Sunday afternoon can be spent in tracing out the maternal origin and history of the tribal ancestors in Genesis, chapters twenty-nine, thirty, thirty-two, thirty-three, thirty-five, verse sixteen foll.; and then comparing with tribal dispositions in the book of Numbers, chapters one, two, three, four, seven. (See Exodus, chapter thirty-one).

The meticulous arrangement of the Tabernacle as a Leah-monopoly is the response of the Jewish, priestly school to the reverse disposal of the Hebrew nation in pre-exilic history and legend. As thus depicted, the Sanctuary stands at the brilliant focus of Priestly, or ecclesiastical, narratives which, in practice, have had three effects, as follows:—to put ritual error on a plane with moral delinquency; to dim out the great Hebrew prophets behind the imposing facade of Priesthood; and to obscure Jehovah, the champion of social and economic justice, behind the outlines of a conventional Deity who is preoccupied with individual "sin".

Evolution toward One God began prior to the Babylonian Exile, under the economic pressure of social problems. But as already pointed out, the growth of monotheism in Judah after the Exile, and in the ancient and medieval Church, could not carry the weight of economic reform. This difficult paradox, however, has been in course of gradual resolution since the close of the Middle Ages; and it is rapidly approaching a climax on the international stage. A bright light is thrown on the general subject by the recently issued Cambridge Economic History (Cambridge University Press). Note the treatment of St. Chrysostom, the last of the ancient Church Fathers who dared raise the economic problem, and who knew far more about the Bible than did those who accomplished his downfall.

Headmaster of Choate Declares Private Schools Lead

They Have Done Full Share in Perpetuating The Best in Christian Culture and Tradition

By George St. John
Headmaster of the Choate School

Wallingford, Conn.: — In democratic America, with its highly developed system of public education, why should a small minority of boys or girls be set apart in the independent boarding schools or day schools? With tremendous sums being spent on public schools, with every citizen taxed for their support, why should the independent schools ask for generous gifts for buildings or endowment? These are natural questions; and here at Choate compelling answers are borne in on me all day long.

Henry Pennypacker, first a headmaster, and for many years wise counsellor for boys and men at Harvard, used to say, "No matter how far a boy may stray while at college or a few years after, by the time he is thirty he will return to the standards and ideals, the faith and the convictions — economic, social and spiritual—of his preparatory school." And said Humboldt, "Whatever you would accomplish in a nation, you must first put in the hearts and minds of a nation's youth." Among national leaders, tragically enough, Hitler has been the first to put into effect this far-reaching truth.

In our country the Churches as a whole have sensed it, the great mass of schools have seen it dimly; but to only a small handful of teachers and schools has it been given (because they so believed in their mission) to work and live by this very creed. It is hardly too much to say that as in the Dark Ages the spark of civilization was kept alive in the monasteries, so in our time Christian civilization has been best fostered in a handful of our schools. It is hardly too much to say that in these schools alone during the past forty years has a boy been surrounded by the standards and ideals, tradition and sheer Christian culture, which in an average English or New England home, during the past century, were his natural inheritance.

Boys brought up in this school tradition have kept writing us during the war from Normandy, Okinawa or Italy. Writing from what others have called a hellhole in the Pacific, one Choate man said, "I'm fighting for the things I've been brought up, at home and at school, to believe in; and, therefore, I'm having the time of my life!"

"The things I've been brought up at school to believe in." The tradition and convictions which the school is passing on to future generations through her boys are the selfsame tradition and convictions for which the United Nations have been fighting. Not the war alone, but that which is in the minds and hearts of men will save civilization. Nobody can say just how much of his point of view, of his abilities and qualities, Mr. Churchill owes to Harrow. But I like to believe that this man who led the way in saving the slow-gained civilization of the centuries from the satanic leader who boasted he would "separate the present from the past," owes some of his compelling beliefs, some of his "robust good spirits when times are black" (and these saved England—and America—in their darkest hours) to his old school.

As I was talking like this the other day, a friend stopped me with, "But all this can be in hundreds of schools!" Of course it can. The sad fact is that in the past, it hasn't been, and nothing short of wishful thinking shows that it will be. The boys and girls of our country as a whole too often, "Look up and are not fed." Irresponsible or sleepy trustees, commonplace and venal school boards, public ignorance and indifference, second-rate teachers, politics, so-called schools of education, parents absorbed in bread-winning or bridge, poor leadership, and often sheer lack of money—all have conspired to put most of our secondary education on a low level. "Whatever else we may say about our schools in America," said Horace Taft, "it must be admitted that most of them are in a bad way." As a few independent colleges have led the way in higher education, so in secondary education the same has been true of a small group of independent schools.

Sometimes it has been said, however, that in the growing democratization of our time this handful of rare schools I am talking about will pass away, that they and what they stand for belong to an aristocracy that is gone. It was Mr. Churchill looking at things another way, who said, "We must beware of trying to build a society in which nobody counts for anything except a politician or an official, a society where enterprise gains no reward, and thrift no privileges." Here is the seer looking into a possible tragic future—a future into which democratic tendencies, however good in themselves, if misinterpreted and carried too far, will lead us. Only leaders trained in the experience of the past, leaders trained in the restraint of what the Latins called "via media" (the middle way) and the Greeks "meden hagan" (nothing too much), can stem the popular tide of commonplaceness, and of levelling closer and closer to the social and economic bottom where the political racketeer has his special chance.

A democracy is no better than its electorate, and an electorate best sees its responsibilities through the eyes of its leaders. Without safe leaders, men wise in their generation, men trained in a great tradition having its roots deep in all that the flower of mankind have learned through the ages—without such leaders the people perish. Whether enough of the alumni of the few schools I have referred to, have in our country been political leaders, is beside the point: the best of them have been leaders in their communities, often writers and speakers, and have often exercised an influence greater than the men in the state capitols or Washington. The nation, sowed as it were with such men, produces a crop of ideas and trends of thought which are the saving health of a democracy.

If the handful of schools in England and in our country which have done more than their share in perpetuating the best in our Christian culture and tradition, are to be allowed through some mistaken upsurge of misinterpreted democracy to be swept away, then whoever won the military victories, everyone in England and America have lost. But there will be men inside these schools and out who will see to it that this never happens. The motto of these English and American schools is "Noblesse oblige"; and the aristocracy that is theirs is an aristocracy which no nation can live without—an aristocracy of the mind and the heart—which people who understand it must preserve.

PROTESTANT EDITORS HOLD CONFERENCE

Washington (RNS): — Resolutions advocating more vigorous promotion of Protestant principles by Protestant editors and publicists were adopted at the conclusion of the annual Associated Church Press convention here. One resolution called upon Protestant religious journals to "set forth increasingly the indispensable Protestant position on all matters affecting the lives and welfare of the American people." The same resolution protested the "growing evidence throughout the United States of anti-Protestant bigotry and intolerance."

"The Protestant ideal of the inherent worth of every human being and the personal liberty of every individual is in direct contrast to the imposition upon the people of the authoritarian concepts of life and government," said the resolution.

The convention approved in principle the formation of "an inclusive Protestant agency for the collection, processing, and distribution of news and the expression of Christian conviction by the use of the methods of public relations."

It was recommended that this agency be an official body related to the Churches but at the same time "free enough to do its work and free enough to be itself an example of the principle of freedom of the press."

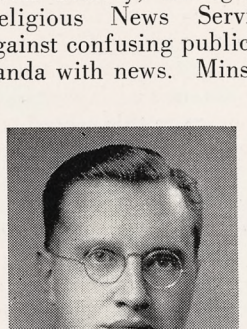
The editors proposed that the agency be set up by cooperation between Protestant denominations and the publicity offices of the eight interchurch agencies which are now considering a merger. Function of the proposed agency, the resolution stated, should be to "bring to bear the contribution of Protestant Christianity through the press and in the general field of public relations."

The resolution was drafted by Harold E. Fey, an editor of the Christian Century, and was presented by Guy Emery Shipler, editor of The Churchman. Shipler is chairman of a committee appointed at the 1945 convention to make a study of Protestant public relations.

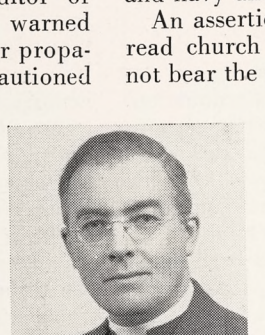
During discussion of the question, Louis Minsky, managing editor of Religious News Service, warned against confusing publicity or propaganda with news. Minsky cautioned also against attempts to promote Protestantism by attacking Roman Catholicism.

"It is one thing," he said, "to promote Protestant ideals in an orderly and responsible manner, even when this goal is believed to require scrutiny and criticism of Roman Catholic policies. It is quite another thing, however, to promote Protestantism by a systematic attack upon Roman Catholicism. I am sure it is not the desire of Protestant editors to bring into existence an organization for the promotion of anti-Catholicism."

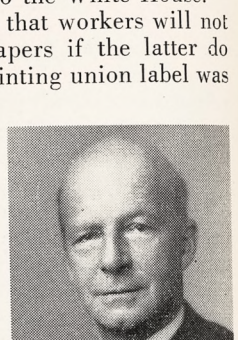
On this point, Fey expressed the opinion that Protestant public relations should seek cooperation with Catholics on problems of joint concern but otherwise should aim to expound and promote Protestant principles and ideals. Details on organization of the proposed agency were not worked out at the convention, but it was urged that Shipler's committee be consulted in any action taken on the proposal by any of the interdenominational agencies. In another action, the editors voted to appoint a committee to consult with heads of theological seminaries and journalism schools regarding institution of courses in religious journalism.



A further resolution congratulated the D.A.R. on its action in permitting the Tuskegee Institute choir to appear in Constitution Hall. The convention expressed hope that the "white artists only" clause would be deleted from the Constitution Hall lease at the forthcoming D.A.R. Continental Congress.



During the three-day meeting, the editors paid visits to the offices of the chiefs of chaplains of the army and navy and to the White House.



An assertion that workers will not read church papers if the latter do not bear the printing union label was made before the convention by Nelson Cruikshank, director of social insurance activities of the AFL. Both Cruikshank and Kermit Eby, educational director of the CIO, criticized religious journals for failing to deal with labor issues.

"I have yet to see an article in a church paper interpreting the spiritual issues and sacrificial devotion involved in a labor struggle," Cruikshank stated.

Eby called upon religious publications to "exercise moral judgment" on labor issues. He said it is a "profound responsibility of the church press to interpret matters of interest to the worker."

CHURCHMEN IN THE NEWS: The Rev. Theodore Ferris, rector of Trinity, Boston, is to be the chaplain of the Wellesley Conference: the Rev. Robert B. Advance Fund Campaign Reaches Seven Million Dollars

Bishop Peabody Urges the National Council To Substantially Increase the 1947 Budget

By W. B. Spofford

New York:—The sum of seven million dollars is now in sight for the Reconstruction and Advance Fund, leaving $1,800,000 to go if the full amount is to be raised. Bishop Henry W. Hobson of Southern Ohio, chairman of promotion, so reported to the National Council, meeting in New York, April 29-May 1. He declared the amount still to be raised was "trifling" and urged that the next four months be used to get the campaign before every member of the Church. A report handed to Council members stated that $5.76 was required from each communicant of the Church if the entire sum is to be realized. The report shows that Delaware leads at present with an average of $25.84 per communicant; Southern Ohio, $14.99; Pennsylvania, $6.66; Spokane, $6.44; Massachusetts, $6.37; California, $6.25. There are thirty-four dioceses listed as either "Incomplete Report" or "No Report," including the large dioceses of New York and Long Island. At the bottom of the list of those reporting are Oklahoma, $1.05 per communicant; South Dakota, $1.52; Colorado, $1.55; Montana, $1.76, with eleven dioceses listed as giving between $2 and $3 per communicant.

On the spending end of the $8,800,000 the chairman of the committee, Vice-President Thayer Addison, stated that they expect to take into full consideration the plans of other Churches and to consult with the numerous interdenominational bodies, particularly in education and medical service. This will apply particularly in the largest missionary field, China. After stressing the importance of cooperation with other Churches, Mr. Addison went on to say that "It is obvious not only in China but in all fields in which we shall spend money that in the present stage of Church disunity we cannot proceed as if all the Churches were one. We could not decline to help rebuild one of our destroyed churches in a Chinese city simply on the ground that the Methodist Church in that city was still standing. Until organic union has advanced further than it has at home there are limits to the cooperation possible in our evangelistic work. It may be added that in primary education the needs and opportunities are so vast that we do not have to worry about duplication. When, however, we consider the middle school, the universities and the hospitals, we are dealing with institutions so relatively few in number and so expensive to maintain that there is every reason to insist on such consultation and cooperation as will prevent duplication."

He then stated that consideration was now being given proposals for a Union Teaching Hospital in Hankow and an East China Christian University which would comprise, through a federation or union, three or four existing universities, including St. John's, Shanghai.

It was also announced that the Hon. Francis B. Sayre of Washington and Mr. Charles P. Taft of Cincinnati had been added to the committee on disbursement of the R. and A. Fund. Previously appointed, in addition to Mr. Addison, are Lewis B. Franklin, Council treasurer; Bishop Dandridge of Tennessee; the Rev. George Wieland, National Council executive; Dr. Kenneth M. Sills of Bowdoin College; Mrs. Arthur M. Sherman, head of the Auxiliary; the Rev. Robert A. Magill of Lynchburg, Va.

Still on the subject of money, in discussing the National Council budget for 1947-48-49, which will be presented at General Convention, Bishop Peabody of Central New York urged that "the new spirit of stewardship aroused by the R. and A. campaign be kept alive" and said that additions should be made "to meet the general demand for some large, important and radical steps forward." He declared that there could be found many such projects but that one example would be plans for a greatly improved theological training for the ministry. He urged that between now and Convention the whole subject of "an adequate cause and the implementation of it" be studied and that the Council should submit to the Convention "a budget that will be a continued high challenge to progress."

It was announced that a budget for 1947 of $3,213,869 would be submitted to the General Convention. Whether this will be increased by General Convention, in line with Bishop Peabody's proposals, remains to be seen. The 1945 budget was $2,587,637; the 1946 budget, $2,735,058.

Still money—Mrs. Sherman, as Auxiliary executive, stated that there was every reason to expect that the United Thank Offering to be presented in September will exceed the last triennium "by a very considerable amount" and revealed that as of April 15 the total is $1,124,143 "which is $5,000 more than the total offering for the last triennium." The executive board of the Auxiliary at its meeting spent most of its time planning for the triennial meeting in Philadelphia. Among other things it considered the fuller representation of minority groups, which will be recommended at the triennial.

The Hon. Francis B. Sayre, former commissioner to the Philippines has been added to the committee on disbursement of the Reconstruction and Advance Fund.

The visit of a commission to the Orient to study needs and opportunities, planned for this month, has been postponed until fall—travel difficulties partly but also it is thought the situation will have been somewhat clarified then so that more effective studies can be made. Those to make the trip eventually are Mr. Addison, Mr. Franklin, Mrs. Sherman and Mr. Magill of Lynchburg. Incidentally, Bishop Gilman of Hankow and Assistant Bishop Robin

Chen of Anking are to represent China at General Convention.

Plans were announced to continue the work of Forward in Service as a part of the department of promotion, with a new executive to be put on the job, at a salary of $5,100, to be known as the Secretary of Evangelism. Nobody has yet been named for the job.

Chaplain Frank L. Titus was named assistant secretary of the overseas department, succeeding the Rev. F. E. Swift who is to return to China in the fall. Chaplain Titus is at present serving on the Queen Mary, "ministering to the British brides who are coming to this country," according to the release of the promotion department.

Efforts to secure inclusion of lay employees under the social security act should be made, according to a resolution unanimously passed by the Council. This is in line with instructions from the 1943 General Convention.

The Council voted $500 as the share of the Episcopal Church toward the expenses of the provisional committee of the World Council of Churches which will meet in London, August 4-7. Those representing the American Churches will be John Foster Dulles, Bishop Oxnam, Reinhold Niebuhr, Bishop Oldham, O. F. Nolde, Georgianna Harkness and Walter Van Kirk.

Bishop Harris of Liberia told the Council of his work in Liberia, stressing particularly that the Church must lead in education, health work and solving the food problem. Bishop Larned, in charge of European Churches, addressed the Auxiliary on conditions there.

KIMBER DEN RECOVERS FROM ILLNESS

Nanchang, Kiangsi, China: — An airmail letter arrived in New York last week from the Rev. Kimber Den, which was dated March 28—and which carried $22 worth of stamps. He writes:

"Since my writing of my last letter to you on September 5, 1945 I fell quite sick and was confined in bed for more than two months. Hence it accounts for my long silence and failure to write to you during such a long interval. However I must confess that I have never failed to think of you with great affection even during my long illness. I caught a very serious type of typhus last winter which almost ended my earthly life. At three critical periods during my illness I lost my consciousness and almost died. How I finally survived was really a miracle.

"Soon after the evacuation of the Japanese from Nanchang City I was called back by my diocese to resume my parish work here at Nanchang where I served for twenty-five years. It was a call which I could hardly decline. So I came here with my family by the end of last November. After two weeks ride on a boat, thanks to God, we finally reached our destination safely. To our great surprise we found both our church properties and the old school building remained intact with only small damages in the midst of a ruined city. My lepers colony which was started ten years ago, I am glad to say, still remains in good condition even though the number of inmates has been reduced from 160 to 40, owing to deaths and other causes. When funds are available I hope to restore to the same number as we had before the war.

"Since my return to Nanchang my health has been very much improved. I seem to be picking up my work again with the same old vigor as I had in the years past, perhaps with more renewed strength. It was indeed a great miracle how we passed through safely the horrors of the war. All the dangers and trials that we have had during the whole period seems to me to have only served to strengthen our faith and to bring us closer to God, our Saviour.

"Besides my parish duties I am also acting concurrently as the director of field work for reconstruction and rehabilitation for the government in its rural project. This of course keeps me quite busy. However I am glad of this opportunity for taking a vital part in the postwar reconstruction of China. Many of my refugee people with their children have lately come back from Lichwan to the Nanchang area where their old homes were located. To their surprise they found all the villages near around wiped out and remained only a heap of ruins. It is now again my job to help these poor farmers to build up again their old homes and start anew their lives on the ruins of the abandoned land. It is a tremendous job, requiring huge sums of money. For this work your humble brother will, of course, need more than ever your continuous interest and encouragement.

"With improved mail service I trust this letter will be able to get to you sometime around Easter. If so please kindly convey through THE WITNESS my best Easter greetings to all of my friends in America and thank them for the great support they have been to us in the war years."

The letter acknowledges the receipt of a donation of $1,000 which came from WITNESS readers and which he received in September, 1945. Since that time two other donations of $1,000 each have been sent—the last only a week ago. We are to continue to receive donations for the great work being done in China by this leader. Those caring to make contributions should make their checks payable to "Treasurer, CLID" and mail to the Chicago League for Industrial Democracy, 155 Washington Street, New York 6.

CATHEDRAL SPRING FESTIVAL

Washington: — The Rev. Samuel M. Cavert, general secretary of the Federal Council of Churches, is to preach at a special service at Washington Cathedral on June 2. That afternoon the speaker at evensong will be Mrs. Harper Sibley of Rochester, N. Y. These services close the second annual spring festival which opens on May 26 when the preacher at the morning service is the Rev. Horace W. B. Donegan of New York. On Monday evening there is a lecture on stained glass by Henry Lee Willet; on Tuesday at noon Mrs. Harry S. Truman formally opens the flower mart and that afternoon Bishop Dun and the cathedral clergy lead in a rogation service with prayers for abundant crops.

Back Price Control

A STRANGE and uneven battle has been taking place in Congress over the future of the price control act. According to the public opinion polls the people of this country registered themselves four to one in favor of price control. Their duly elected representatives in the lower House have, however, ignored or defied the express will of the people and mutilated the price control act into ineffectiveness.

The response from the country has been almost unprecedented. Letters to Congressmen, radio programs, advertisements in the daily papers have deluged people and Congressmen alike. It is reported that the Representatives are now somewhat sobered, and at this writing there is hope that the Senate may undo the damage done by the House.

The apparently uneven nature of this conflict—the millions supporting OPA, the few opposed to it, makes us puzzle over this strange situation. We know who the millions are—they are the great masses of our citizenry and they include small businessmen and manufacturers of consumer goods. Who then are the few? They hide behind the lobbies like that of the National Association of Manufacturers—but not all members of even that association share their views. Why has it required the aroused opinion of the whole nation to stop these lobbies from gaining their goals? What is the power wielded by so few that it must be matched by so many before it is stopped? What do the few hope to gain by wrecking price control?

The answers to these questions are not yet on the record. They can only be inferred from the statements of reliable administrators like Henry Morgenthau, Jr., but it appears that the monopolies of heavy industry are behind the inflationary drive. If this is true, and if the monopolies are more interested in their own power than in the welfare of the nation and the world, the probable course of development is very disturbing.

If price control is wrecked and inflation follows, many small businesses, many small farms, many labor unions will be wrecked in the process. Those who will weather the storm will be the monopolies, the giant basic industries and finance. These great aggregations will acquire the bankrupt businesses and the lost farm lands. The men from these businesses and farms will join the enlarged pool of unemployed workers. With fewer employers competing for workers, organized labor will again be broken, as it was stifled after the first world war. An economic pattern of undisturbed monopoly may appear for the first time in an America in which freedom and equality are almost completely submerged.

These speculations are not pretty but neither is the situation in Congress. When you read this the Senate may already have reversed the action of the House. If the question is still being debated, write to your Senators. There are in particular thirteen Senators who need to be convinced of the need by the people: Warren R. Austin (Vt.); Joseph H. Ball (Minn.); Owen Brewster (Me.); C. Douglas Buck (Del.); Arthur Capper (Kan.); Homer Ferguson (Mich.); Chan Gurney (S. D.); Thomas C. Hart (Conn.); Wayne Morse (Ore.); Robert A. Taft (O.); Leverett Saltonstall (Mass.); H. Alexander Smith (N. J.); Alexander Wiley (Wis.).

Our present political situation is not a matter of parties — it seems to be a conflict between light industry on the side of the people, and heavy industry, which is attempting to regain the undisputed dominance it possessed before the Roosevelt era. As we see it a Christian has little choice in this matter. The voice of the people is not the voice of God, but meeting people's needs is clearly the will of God.

"QUOTES"

IT HAS been a long fight to put the control of our economic system in the hands of government, where it can be administered in the interests of the people as a whole. Now Congress, under the influence of powerful lobbies, is rapidly trying to return control to big business. It may be that individual Congressmen do not realize just what they are doing, but they are heading us straight for inflation and accepting the old "boom and bust" ideas, instead of sticking to the plan of ironing out the peaks and the valleys and trying to keep us on a fairly even keel.

—Eleanor Roosevelt

Congratulations All Around

DAVID JOHNSON, son of the Rev. John H. Johnson, rector of St. Martin's, New York City, has recently been elected president of the Haverford College Student Association. He is a young man of charm and ability. His record in college is notable. He was captain of the 1945 tennis team, and after three years on the basketball squad was elected co-captain this year. The notable aspect of this honor lies in the fact that David Johnson is a Negro. Our pride in the product of the rectory makes us want to congratulate him; we cannot refrain from congratulating his father; but most of all we think Haverford College and its students are to be congratulated for the illustrious example they have set society in this emancipation from race prejudice.

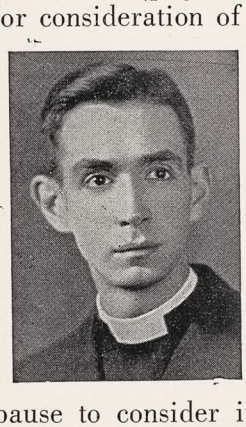
Strategy and Tactics



A NEW columnist is introduced with this number—the Rev. Francis O. Ayers Jr., the rector of St. John's, Waterbury, Connecticut. He is well known throughout the Church as the rector of a strong and progressive parish. The purpose of the column he himself states in his introduction so that we hardly need add anything, except that we do hope you will act upon his invitation to send him suggestions and comments and questions pertaining to parish life that you would like to have answered.

The Prayer of Humble Access II

WE HAVE held over from last time a discussion of the latter part of the Prayer of Humble Access (page 82), so as to have more space for consideration of the 6th chapter of St. John's Gospel, whose teaching furnishes the context for a proper understanding of the phrases "to eat the flesh" and "to drink his blood." Inasmuch as this chapter of Scripture is one of the chief sources for the Church's doctrine of the Eucharist, and particularly of the Real Presence, it is well that we pause to consider it more carefully. It is only fair to say that New Testament scholars are not all of one mind regarding the interpretation of this difficult chapter. I do not claim any special grace of insight which is denied more learned commentators; but you understand that well enough.

St. John 6 is a long chapter of 71 verses, not all of which is read at one time in our liturgical lectionary. The miracle of the feeding of the 5000 (verses 1-14), which forms the basis of the lengthy discourse of Jesus, is the Gospel for Lent IV. The lectionary of the Daily Office appropriately expands this reading by appointing verses 27-40 for Morning Prayer, and verses 41-51 for Evening Prayer, on the same Sunday. Verses 53-69 are appointed as an evening lesson on Whitsunday. Brief sections of the chapter are also assigned as the Gospel for a Burial and for the Communion of the Sick, and as a morning lesson on Thanksgiving Day. From this very varied use of the chapter on such widely different occasions, it will be seen at once how richly suggestive in teaching this chapter is.

The feeding of the 5000 was associated in the minds of the early Christians with the Eucharist. Our evangelist makes a special point of this by referring to its occurrence when the Passover was at hand. The chief lesson of the story is that our resources, however little, when offered entirely to Christ for His blessing and distribution, become more than enough to satisfy the hunger of men. But the crowd who enjoyed this feast thought only in material terms. A prophet who could so satisfy their physical hunger must be made a king. Jesus was not offering them a temporal kingdom, but an eternal kingdom of spiritual life. This life is given to those who have faith in Him, as One sent from God. To believe in Him is to be nourished, as it were, with "true bread from heaven" which is nothing other than Himself. Thus to feed on Him by faith is to enjoy not only imperishable sustenance but everlasting life itself—something entirely different from the meat of ordinary earthly life for which we labor or even of the day-to-day manna from heaven with which Israel was provided by God in the wilderness.

Jesus' Galilean hearers were puzzled enough when He (whose human parents they knew) claimed to have come from heaven. They were amazed when He identified that heavenly Bread, which He was, with His very flesh which He was to offer up on Calvary to rid the world of sin and give it life. How could they eat His flesh? How could they drink His blood? Even His intimate disciples were troubled by this "hard saying." Whereupon Jesus explained to them that His flesh and blood which they should eat and drink was not that of His physical body, but that of His ascended and glorified Body — when, to use St. Paul's phrase, He should be "a quickening spirit." Our minds cannot conceive the nature of His glorified "flesh and blood." But we apprehend it by faith as a spiritual Reality. Jesus concludes his discourse with a demand for a decision, Shall we believe and follow Him? The answer is Peter's ringing confession, said in the name of all who believe, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God."

The whole mystery of our redemption is laid bare in this wonderful chapter of St. John's Gospel —the Father's sending of His Son into the world, His Incarnation, Passion and Exaltation, His continuing, indwelling, life-giving Spirit in Word and Sacrament. All of this lies behind the "hard saying" enshrined in our Prayer of Humble Access.

Word-made-flesh, true bread he maketh
By his word his Flesh to be,
Wine his Blood; when man partaketh,
Though his senses fail to see,
Faith alone, when sight forsaketh,
Shows true hearts the mystery.

Or in the more prosaic words of the Thirty-Nine Articles: "The Body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten, in the Supper, only after an heavenly and spiritual manner. And the mean whereby the Body of Christ is received and eaten in the Supper, is Faith."

What Is Christian Marriage?

by DuBose Murphy

Rector at Tuscaloosa, Alabama

AT LEAST some of the confusion attending our discussion of the divorce problem is brought about by the fact that we do not have an adequate definition of marriage. There is, further, a distinction between marriage and Christian marriage. Let us begin by asking, What is marriage?

Is it an ecclesiastical ceremony? Clearly it is not. There was no specifically religious ceremony in connection with marriage in first century Judaism. There was no religious ceremony in the Christian Church for the first eight or nine centuries. It would be the extreme of sacerdotalism to assert that the solemnization of matrimony, performed by a clergyman, makes a marriage where there was no marriage before. The accepted doctrine of the Church is that the public ceremony recognizes and blesses something which already exists; the couple "marry each other" and then the Church adds her blessing.

Is it the physical consummation of sexual union? At first sight this would seem to be what our Lord implies (Mark 10:7-9); and this possible interpretation seems to be supported by St. Paul (I Corinthians 6:15-16). Yet it is a serious strain upon common sense to assert that marriage takes place when a man and a woman first engage in sexual intercourse. Certainly this is not what anyone means by marriage, and even more certainly it is not in any sense of the word Christian marriage.

Zero plus zero equals zero. We may go on to say that a Church ceremony followed by physical consummation does not make a marriage. We are familiar with the so-called mariage de convenience, the alliance of a man and a woman brought about, often by the parents without regard to the wishes of the parties concerned, for reasons of state or business. We have seen how such alliances, undertaken without mutual affection, have provided an excuse for extra-marital romances in which the husband, or the wife, seeks to find that emotional satisfaction which marriage has not provided. We have seen also cases of youthful infatuation which reflect no serious or stable purpose. We have even officiated at ceremonies when we could not help wondering if the parties were at all conscious of God. When we say "Those whom God hath joined together. . . ." can we confidently believe in every case that God hath joined them together? Has there never been in our hearts a lurking suspicion that God has had nothing to do with the case? Can we solemnly assert that every couple whom we have married has knowingly undertaken a life-long physical and spiritual union which is analogous to that between Christ and His Church?

It is beside the point to say that our canons provide for instruction on the nature of holy matrimony. Every priest knows that couples very rarely come and ask whether or not they ought to get married; they come and tell him that they are going to be married and will he please officiate on the date which they have chosen. He may insist upon instructing them; and, even if they do not resent what they may consider an intrusion into their private affairs, he has no way of knowing whether they are listening to him or thinking about the kind of dresses the bridesmaids are to wear.

HOWEVER, let us return to our original question: what is marriage? I offer, as a provisional definition: Marriage is the mutual agreement of a man and a woman to enter into that relationship (physical, moral, and economic) which is recognized by the laws and customs of the society in which they live. Christian marriage is the conscious, sincere, and honorable agreement of a man and a woman to enter into the married state (as defined above) accepting the distinctive ideals of Christianity as valid and trusting in the power of the Holy Spirit to enable them to approach these ideals in their life together.

The sincerity of this undertaking is something known to God alone. It is therefore beyond the power of the Church, or any minister thereof, to decide whether or not a given union is a Christian marriage. Accordingly, all questions of divorce, annulment, re-marriage, etc., should be reserved to the civil authority on the simple basis of the legal and social aspects of the case.

It is the part of the Church to present Christian marriage as an ideal, just as the Church should present any vocation (medicine, teaching, agriculture, etc.) as a way by which God may be served and glorified. It is, further, the part of the Church to foster habits of self-sacrifice, forbearance, cooperation, and understanding, through self-discipline, loyalty to our Lord, and reliance on the power of God bestowed through prayer and sacrament.

It is therefore suggested that all marriages be performed by the state; and, although it is probably too much to suggest that the office of solemnization of matrimony be removed from the Book of Common Prayer, it would be helpful if the Church would provide a proper service for the recognition of such couples as desire publicly to accept the distinctive ideals of Christian marriage and to receive the Church's blessing upon their union.

A Soldier's Warning

An Address Delivered to American Soldiers at Wuerzburg, Germany

IT HAS been brought to my attention that the morale of the civilian population of Wuerzburg and vicinity has been greatly raised as the result of a speech in the United States by a British politician relative to our allies, the Russian people.

I have also learned that a few men from this battalion have expressed agreement with these policies to German fraeuleins. This practice will stop immediately and you may be sure that I will use great effort on the part of the counter-intelligence corps and S-2 personnel to see that it stops right now.

The Soviet Government is an ally of the United States of America and you are individually and collectively representatives of our Government. I will not tolerate any disparaging remarks against our allies to the German people.

I do not hate the German people. My policy in regard to dancing and social gatherings should indicate that fact to you. But I cannot forget that the sun can never set upon the grave of some American soldier.

From Pearl Harbor and Bataan to the Elbe, your buddies are lying dead because of the Nazi party and the evil machinations of Hitler and his gang.

If you are a Catholic stop to remember that the Nazi party persecuted hundreds of nuns and priests and tried to frame them on immorality charges.

If you are a Protestant think of Pastor (the Rev. Martin) Niemoeller.

If you are Jewish  just do not let your fraeulein's opinion influence yours.

She has been reared in an atmosphere of hatred and intolerance for all nations of earth except for the master race we have just whipped.

Millions of Russian soldiers and civilians died to save our skins. Just remember that. If propaganda causes you to hate the Russians, stop and think. They died for you, too.

If you want to fight again, encouraging these fraeuleins that we hate Russia is a good way to get things going. Those were the good old days, yes? Standing in the tracks all day in the bitter cold, dirty, hungry and tired. Firing off the line of departure. Making river crossings. Sweating out barrages. It is cold in Russia. Remember that.

In case you think I am Pinko and you want to write a letter to the B-bag (Stars and Stripes letter column) let me forestall you. In political thinking I am a conservative Southern Democrat.

An ancestor of my name was killed in the war of the American Revolution. But the Russians are our allies. They have guts. They kept hordes of Jerries off of us and by God I never want to fight again. Think it over. You have been warned.

_Over the Sea, the Sky_ by Edwin McNeill Poteat. Harper's. $1.50.

Dr. Poteat has an established reputation as a poet and as a religious leader, yet these poems, which are for the most part religious, show none of the strut and arrogance evidenced in the expressed faith of many churchmen of authority. Here is no "God and I are on a higher platform than the rest of you." The author is down on the ground among us, humbled as he looks up to our common Father. His devotion loses no dignity thereby; his simplicity carries more weight than does argument.

In whimsical moments he twists old sayings,

Biblical and other, to bring to light a new feature, often by juxtaposing the past and the present. In The Jericho Road:

How hard for those in limousines
To heal the hurt of man!
It was a slow-paced ass that bore
The Good Samaritan.

And in Blackout:

"Let there be light," God said,
And it was good.
A savage groping through the wood
Fell prostrate on the ground in dread.

Others warmed their caves, cooked food, hung lamps outside their doors to help travelers. Galaxies of light followed until overhead came enemies "on wings of fury and of hate," and

Man groped, seeking a cave within the city—
What folly, and what pity!
"Let it be dark," he said.

Dr. Poteat projects himself mentally into the family life of the Child Jesus and finds amusing similarities between all parents in Mary Pondered All These Things:

Mothers still, it seems,
Keep their hearts like Mary—

Men like Joseph yet

Simeon no doubt was Sim.

He wonders, as they did their carpentry together

How the younger brothers spoke
To the Elder we call God.

A keen love of beauty runs through all these verses. Thus in the opening poem on Creation, more important than the first appearance of living creatures in the ocean was that out of their effort, rhythmic, undulate . . .

Grace was born of motion.

With plant life

. . . in the primal hour
Color was born of flower.

In the same way, "Music was born of bird;" language was born with primal man when " 'Woman,' he cried. . . . 'Lover,' she sighed."

But Dr. Poteat gives signs of inquietude more than once that the artistic side of life is of such importance to him—what he calls "Earth's adroit, ingratiating prod." In Ivory Tower

I'll ask a saint who knows the mind of God
Why beauty should contrive to dull the wit. . .

he cries. Even the sea calls to him, the sea he knows so little. He asks in Nostalgia:

Is it the soul's caprice, an errant notion,
Or some unlearned, untaught fidelity? . . .
Why should its waters, resting league on league
Down cool and emerald distances, intrigue
A spirit, fevered by an inner fire
That finds no fuel underneath a spire . . . ?
Is it to souls ill-nurtured by the sod
The sea would teach the mystery of God?
I have not known its rapture, but in me
There stirs a strange nostalgia for the sea.

This disquiet appears most clearly in I Who Love Beauty, where the poet complains that, loving beauty in open valleys, sunsets, swallow's flight, he Must breathe the air of squalid city alleys. . .

Sharing with sordid souls a city's blight. . .
He too loved beauty, but a city drew Him.
Flowers he found in little children's eyes;
Something of grace in lepers stumbling to Him.
Courage in service, hope in sacrifice.

Dr. Poteat's poetry can rise to great and impersonal heights, as in the hymn for the ecumenical movement, Eternal God Whose Searching Eye Doth Scan, but, to one reader's mind, as a profession of pure faith nothing can touch the beauty of God's Arms. This poem brings together the infinite in space and our immediate surroundings, length of universal time and the actual moment, the magnitude of God's love and its personal tenderness—in such a manner that one feels exalted and at the same time tranquilized.

Strategy and Tactics
For the Parish

By

FRANCIS O. AYERS, JR.
Rector of St. John's, Waterbury, Connecticut

AT THE end of his address at the Malvern Conference, Mr. J. Middleton Murry said, "So I will put my criticism provocatively in these words. The Church fails in leadership, because it shows no sign of having known despair; no evidence of having been terrified by its own impotence." Because I believe this to be profoundly true, because I believe that the impotence of the Church is nowhere greater than in the parish, and because, at the same time, I believe that a parish can be "a demonstration of the Holy Spirit and of power," I have volunteered to conduct this column.

I am sure that there are many people, laymen as well as clergymen, who have faced facts about the present state of parish life, who have experienced despair and even terror, and who have done some good hard thinking in addition to some good hard work in an attempt to remedy the situation. The trouble is that there has been no place, other than occasional meetings and conferences, where ideas, knowledge, and experience might be shared. The purpose of Strategy and Tactics will be to meet, in some small way, this need.

I would like to conduct the column as an open forum on the strategical and tactical aspects of parish work. "Strategy" says George MacLeod, "is the preparing of the battle in the large—how to win the modern world for Christ: tactics is the execution of that battle in the field—what it begins to mean for the local congregation." I ask, therefore, for your help. What are the questions or problems which you think important or which you find particularly difficult? What are the suggestions, comments or criticisms which you have to make about parish work as it is now conducted or as someone says it ought to be conducted? What have you found effective? Don't be overmodest. Needless to say, I am not, or I wouldn't be writing such a column. Don't be timid. Your name will not be used whenever you request it to be withheld. And please, laymen and laywomen; don't make the fatal (for the Church) mistake of thinking that only the clergy have anything to say on this subject.

Dramatic Arts and Religion

By
WILLIAM B. SPOFFORD, JR.

DURING the war the American entertainment industry promised that it would no longer produce pictures, plays or radio programs that showed any minority in unfavorable, ridiculous and unrealistic stereotypes. The legitimate stage has come through in fine style; the radio could be called fifty percent successful and the movies, by and large, seem to be still playing in Hitler's backyard.

Since the pledge was taken, we have had many plays that have attempted to deal honestly with the racial conflicts in this country and to show the members of the minority as human beings—good, evil and indifferent. True, none of the plays could be called eternal drama. And yet they have been honest attempts with a real understanding of what democracy and Christianity mean. Within the past year, we have had three such plays dealing with the question of relations between black and white skinned humans. Deep Are The Roots, Jeb and Strange Fruit tackled the problem and, though they didn't give us the solution, they did present the situation with clarity and insight.

The young, liberal radio authors have also been doing a first-rate job on the racial front. Powerful plays like Washington, D. C. and Act of Faith, adapted from Irwin Shaw's great New Yorker story, are testimony enough to their work. Likewise members of minority groups are being used on major programs, not as symbols of a group in society, but as first class actors and artists. Danny Kaye's chief assistant is the Negro, Butterfly McQueen, and Kaye has yet to call attention to her race. Miss McQueen, by the way, once walked out on a Jack Benny show because she protested over a maid part that she was expected to play and, likewise, in protest over the stereotyped role that Rochester generally plays on that program. Eddie Cantor's vocalist is young Thelma Carpenter, a Negro discovery and Eddie Green plays the only intelligent person in Duffy's Tavern. The worst radio show in its malicious maligning of minorities is The Great Gildersleeve which oozes condescension towards the Negro people.

As for the motion pictures—well, they seem scared to death to live up to their pledge. They still insist upon bringing out all-Negro pictures, like Stormy Weather, or else they always show the Negro people in inferior, menial characterizations. Even a good film like The Southerner lost some of its punch when it tried to be honest about the South without showing a single Negro in the film. Generally Hollywood puts out something like The Bride Wore Boots which in its attitude towards race is a picture that should call forth the righteous anger of all democrats. On general principles I am against the activities of the censoring board of the Hays-Johnson office but when it lets a film like this last to pass on to the theaters of the country one wonders what principles of censorship that board employs. The movie industry is obviously led by "blind guides, which strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel."

Wellesley Conference Resumes After the War Years

The Christian Answer to the Modern World Is the Theme of the Conference Next Month

Edited by Sara Dill

Boston:—The Conference for Church Work to be held at Wellesley College, June 24th to July 3rd, has been streamlined to the thought that is preeminent in the minds of multitudes groping for a pathway of peace and security, "The Christian Answer to the Modern World." Wellesley College offers an ideal home for men and women and youth of college age to re-think the Christian imperative in the light of power politics aggressiveness, and to be inspired by leaders of Christian thought. Wellesley is a recreative experience. Here the conviction is deepened, new means of activity presented, new friendships made.

The conference will have a central theme but the program will be of unusual appeal to those with specialized interests. The school of church music, men's work, women's work, Christian education, youth problems and refresher courses for the clergy will be adequately presented at Wellesley.

The conference has been most fortunate in securing Dr. Richard Niebuhr of Yale University School of Theology to lecture the first period of each day to the entire conference on "The Christian Answer." Dr. Niebuhr is one of the outstanding thinkers and teachers of our day; his lectures will inspire one for years to come.

It is fundamental that all should know the Christian answer, but the next problem of the modern is, "How can I live it?" "How can I apply it?" "How can I teach it?" The Courses which follow Dr. Niebuhr's lectures are arranged to answer this problem with practical means and methods.

The Rev. Thomas H. Chappell of Dedham, "The Answer as revealed in Church History"; and the Rev. Charles W. F. Smith of Wellesley, "The Answer as found in the Parables of Jesus."

A course which every layman of the Church will want to attend is "Organizing the average church to make possible the Christian answer." It is to be given by the Rt. Rev. Stephen E. Keeler of Minnesota, the director of the conference. Many will remember Bishop Keeler's inspiring presentation at the laymen's conference held at St. Mark's School.

"Women's work and the Christian answer" will be presented by Mrs. John E. Hill of Philadelphia. Mrs. Hill is the president of the Woman's Auxiliary for the third province. "How to present the Christian answer to youth," "Adolescent problems" and "Methods in teachings" will be given by specialists in the field of Christian education. Instructors will be announced in the near future.

The chaplain of the conference will be the Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity Church in Boston. Dr. Ferris will also offer a course in "Preaching the Christian answer to the modern world." The Rev. William Spofford, editor of THE WITNESS, and a straight from the shoulder speaker on social ills of the present, will be the instructor in the course on "Social problems and the Christian answer" with a number of lectures in this course given by Professor Vida D. Scudder of Wellesley College. We need especially after a war experience to review our thinking on "Personal moral problems." The Rev. Robert W. Woodroofe, rector of Grace Church in Newton and a chaplain with the armed forces in World War II has been invited to lead this course. There will be ample opportunity for personal conferences and acquaintanceship with all the leaders of the conference.

The school of Church music will be under the direction of Mr. William Strickland, who rose to nation-wide prominence as the director of the orchestra of the army school of music in Washington, D. C. Mr. Strickland was master of music in St. George's School, Newport, R. I., and assistant organist and choirmaster at St. Bartholomew's and Grace Churches in New York. He has recently edited a series of "Modern American organ music." Mr. Strickland plans to invite leaders in the field of Church music as special lecturers and recitalists. Mr. Strickland will conduct the famous Wellesley conference choir, membership in which is open to all the members of the conference.

The evening forums will present the pressing problem of "The World challenge to Christian unity." We are hoping that the Rt. Rev. Henry Knox Sherrill, of Boston will be the speaker on the opening forum of the Conference and relate his firsthand knowledge of Europe as an ambassador of the Federal Council of Churches. Other outstanding speakers for the evening forums will be announced in the conference program.

On Human Rights

Los Angeles: — The Rev. H. Randolph Moore, rector of St. Philip the Evangelist here, has announced a conference on "The Church as champion of essential human rights," which will be held in Philadelphia, September 4-6. It will be under the auspices of the Conference of Church Workers Among Colored People of which Mr. Moore is vice-president and chairman of the program committee. Speakers will include Bishop Harris of Liberia, Judge Hubert T. Delany of New York, the Rev. Tollie L. Caution, director of Negro work of the National Council. It is announced also that Helen Gahagan Douglas, member of Congress, has been invited to speak and that Miss Marian Anderson had been asked to sing. Others to take part in the program will be Bishop Stevens of Los Angeles, the Rev. Almon R. Pepper of the National Council staff; Prof. F. B. Washington of Atlanta University; Bishop Avery Mason, coadjutor of Dallas; the Rev. William B. Spofford of THE WITNESS, the Rev. Harry E. Rahming of Denver and Bishop Voegeli of Haiti.

Aiding Neighbor

North Plainfield, N. J.: — St. Peter's Evangelical Lutheran Church, a block from the Holy Cross, had a fire early in Lent which made their church unuseable. The Rev. Robert B. Gribbon, rector of Holy Cross, with his senior warden, immediately offered the use of the plant to the Lutheran congregation, which was accepted with appreciation. The result of the cooperation has been most happy, and in Holy Week, the Good Friday services were shared by the two pastors and congregations. On Palm Sunday and Easter Day, St. Peter's congregation requested the use of the church instead of parish house and held their services at 2 p.m. Each Sunday morning, a nursery school for children of churchgoers is run jointly during the time for mid-morning service.

Choir Festival

Boston: — The four-choir festival sponsored by the diocesan commission on Church music and held in All Saints' Church, Brookline, on the evening of April 28 is expected to usher in a decided effort toward better music in public worship through the formation of a permanent diocesan organization of choirs, their organists and directors, and clergy toward that end. The Sunday evening program presented an example of what may be done with varying forms of church music and was planned by the Rev. Cuthbert Fowler, chairman, of St. Andrew's Church, Belmont; the Rev. Theodore P. Ferris of Trinity Church; and the Rev. Massey H. Shepherd, Jr., of the Episcopal Theological School faculty. Choirs and their organists and directors presenting this program which attracted wide and favorable comment were: All Saints', Roland Halfpenny; the Church of Our Saviour, Gardner Evans; St. Paul's Church, William B. Burbank, all of Brookline; and Church of the Redeemer, Miss Ruth Abbott, of Chestnut Hill.

Clarence H. Poor

Cambridge:—Clarence H. Poor, a leading layman of the diocese of Massachusetts died on April 26th. He had served in many capacities in the diocese and was long a member of Christ Church here where he served as a vestryman and junior warden.

Youth Conference

Concord, N. H.:—The youth conference of the province of New England will be held at St. Paul's School, June 18-27. Concord has a habit of retaining members of the faculty year after year. New members this year are the Rev. Frederick M. Morris, rector of Trinity Church, Newton Center; the Rev. Leverett Davis, rector of Christ Church, Exeter, N. H.; the Rev. John H. Evans, rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Fitchburg, and Mrs. Frederick C. Lawrence of St. Paul's, Brookline. Bishop-Elect Richard Emrich continues his long service as chaplain and the Rev. William Brewster will be the conference director. Mr. T. James Hallam, of St. Dunstan's Choir School, Providence, will have charge of the music. The Rev. Malcolm Taylor will be the conference chairman and Mrs. Edgar W. Anderson will supervise the group leaders. Former faculty members returning are Dean Hatch, Rev. Charles H. Hall, Rev. Francis O. Ayers, Jr., Rev. Frederick H. Arterton, Rev. David W. Norton, Jr., Rev. Shunji F. Nishi, Miss Lillian M. Boyd, Miss Mary C. Buchan and Miss Helen Turnbull.

Passover

Boston:—Rabbi Norman M. Goldberg of Temple Israel, Brockton, preached a Passover time sermon in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul on Sunday evening, April 28, and—at the dean's request, one such as he might have preached to his own congregation. This was in sequence to Dean Edwin J. van Etten's own sermon in the morning, "Crossing the Red Sea," and dealing with the ancient Jewish Passover to which many references are made in the preface, canticle, psalms and canticle for Easter, in our Church.

Youth Conference

Cincinnati, O.: — The dioceses of Ohio are to hold a conference for youth at Denison College, Granville, June 17-22. The dean is the Rev. Harris J. Mowry Jr. of Springfield, Ohio, and on the faculty are the Rev. John J. Weaver of Troy, O., Mr. George V. Hood of Middletown, O.; the Rev. S. Hughes Garvin, also of Middletown; the Rev. Raymond K. Riebs of Dayton; the Rev. David R. Thornberry of Cincinnati; the Rev. Charles E. Fish of Xenia, and Miss Betty Smith of Miami University. A headliner will be Dr. T. Z. Koo of China who will deliver several lectures.

Consider Ministry

Cambridge, Mass.: — Forty Harvard students met with Chaplain Frederic B. Kellogg on April 29 to consider the ministry as their life work. He presented three leaders: the Rev. Lucther Tucker of the Yale Christian Association; the Rev. Gardiner M. Day, rector of Christ Church; Dean Charles L. Taylor of the Episcopal Theological School. The many questions following the addresses indicated a lively interest in the subject.

Finger Lakes

Syracuse, N. Y.: — The Finger Lakes conference, sponsored by the four upstate dioceses of New York, will open at Hobart College on June 25 and run to Friday, July 5. The over-all conference theme is "How to know and use your Bible," and heading up the faculty as chief lecturer is Professor Charles Field.

Mold for Manhood!

Every red blooded growing boy, at some time or other, has been stirred by the call of the sea . . . the desire to feel the salt spray in his face . . . take a trick at the helm under the stars . . . and share in the romance and adventure from which grew America's position as the world's greatest sea power.

This natural appeal of the sailor's life is the basic thought behind the Ocean City Academy, located in the former Coast Guard Station at Ocean City, N. J. Here is a different Summer camp for lads 10 to 18 that satisfies their nautical desires, and is of invaluable benefit to their physical, mental and character development.

Parents sensing in their sons a restlessness of an idle, unplanned Summer, or listlessness toward getting into a real constructive hobby so essential to normal youth development, will find here a program that will thrill the normal boy and fix in him an appreciation of the simple rules of finding success and happiness in life.

A Planned Program

The Ocean City Academy plan is to build young bodies, minds and spirits so they will be developed into fine, considerate, ambitious young men. This can only be accomplished if the lad is interested and happy. Only ex-Naval officers skilled in youth direction and seamanship training will make up our staff. Boys will attend the Church of their faith each Sunday. Former Naval doctor in attendance. Fine food will be stressed. Season extends from June 24 to September 9th. Partial season applications accepted.

Full description of the program will be supplied by writing to Captain Allan E. Shubert, USNR., Ocean City Academy, 1403 Bankers Securities Building, Phila. 7, Pa.

ing, professor of social ethics, Toronto University. Other members of the faculty are: The Rev. Massey H. Shepherd, Episcopal Theological School; the Rev. John Heuss, Jr., St. Matthew's Church, Evanston, Ill.; the Rev. John Frank, rector of the Holy Trinity, Toronto; the Rev. Raymond Cunningham, Trinity Church, Hartford, Conn. The president of the board of governors is the Rev. W. Thomas Heath, rector of Trinity Church, Buffalo.

Toward Unity

St. Joseph, Mo.:—A new approach to Protestant unity was tried out in this city and the results were highly successful. Christ Church invited the congregations of three other downtown churches, in turn, as guests, on successive Sunday evenings. The pastor of each was invited to preach. The host and guest idea was emphasized at an elaborate buffet supper in the undercroft preceding each service, when the members of the vestry were hosts to the governing officials of the visiting church and wives. The rector, the Rev. James S. Allen, read evening prayer at each service.

Though the congregations of most of the churches involved ordinarily are allergic to Sunday night services, they turned out en masse in witness to the ecumenical movement. Christ Church was packed for each occasion and a gratifying atmosphere of cordiality and fellowship was in evidence. The offerings, amounting to over $300 went to the Federal Council of Churches.

The Rev. E. B. Whitcomb, pastor of the Westminster Presbyterian Church, said that only Church government, not diverging faiths, parted Episcopalians and Presbyterians. The Rev. Adiel J. Moncrief, pastor of the First Baptist Church, urged that each denomination cherish its own heritage while stressing the fundamental Protestant unity. The Rev. Reno R. Frobenius, pastor of the First English Lutheran Church, urged a unified, aggressive program in both home and foreign missions. The Rev. Robert Bentley, pastor of the First Congregational Church, advocated global strategy for Christians in today's world.

Ban Pastoral

Paris (wireless to RNS):—French authorities in Germany have forbidden Roman Catholic churches to read a joint pastoral letter by seven German bishops protesting against policies of the four occupying powers, it was revealed here. Reason for the ban, it was stated, was the "aggressive tone" in which the pastoral was written. Signers of the letter were the Archbishop of Cologne, and the bishops of Aachen, Munster, Osnabruck, Trier, Fulda, and Hildersheim. It was intended to be read in all churches of the French and British zones.

British authorities are reported to have made no attempt to interfere with the reading of the pastoral letter. Spokesmen were quoted as saying they could not interfere with the freedom of the church, and that even if reading of the letter were prohibited "it would be circulated secretly."

The pastoral took particular exception to agrarian reforms carried out in the Russian occupation zone.

Pope to Speak

Rome (wireless to RNS): — Pope Pius XII is expected to deliver an important address shortly on the European political situation, according to informed Vatican sources. His speech will probably stress occupation problems in Germany and may be timed for his name day, June 2. Vatican authorities have thus far refused to comment on protests by Roman bishops in western Germany against "harsh" occupation laws, but admit that the situation in Germany was repeatedly discussed by Pope Pius in audiences with the German cardinals during the consistory last February. During his stay in Rome, the late August Cardinal Count von Galen, Bishop of Munster, informed the pontiff that Germans are disturbed by cases of sudden arrests "without explanation" and by injustices resulting from indiscriminate de-Nazification measures. Conrad Cardinal von Preysing, Bishop of Berlin, stressed the danger arising from the "starvation and misery" of millions of displaced persons in Germany.

Constitution Opposed

Paris (wireless to RNS):—Roman Catholic Bishop Louis Rastouil of Limoges has issued a pastoral letter urging parishioners to vote against the new French constitution in the forthcoming referendum. Read in all churches under the bishop's jurisdiction, the letter opposed the constitution "because the declaration of rights does not guarantee the essential principles of Catholic doctrine in regard to the human person, the family, and society." A similar protest was made previously by Bishop Jean Jacques Weber of Strasbourg.

Praise the Church

Washington (RNS): — Chief of Staff Dwight D. Eisenhower warned members of the general commission on army and navy chaplains and a large number of religious notables that "unless there is a moral regeneration throughout the world, there's no hope for mankind—and we'll all disappear in the dust of an atomic explosion."

In a brief, hard-hitting speech favoring Church action in peace to build a strong international organization and tolerance and goodwill throughout the world, the chief of staff asserted that the work of chaplains is even more important in peace than in war.

"I believe in organization as much as in moral regeneration," Eisenhower told several hundred churchmen at a luncheon. "Through the Church, the forces of tolerance, goodwill, and sympathy may be used to save the world. We must show the world what can be accomplished by tolerance, love, and appreciation of the hopes and fears of other peoples. You men who represent the general commission on army and navy chaplains have done and are doing a good job. Keep it up."

Admiral of the Fleet Chester W. Nimitz, told the same audience that "no corps had a higher percentage of casualties during the early phases of the late war in the Pacific than the chaplains corps" and that naval chaplains had made for themselves an undying "record of valour." Pointing out that in September 1939, when the navy first started its reenlistment preparedness program, there were only 91 naval chaplains on active duty and 63 in reserve, Admiral Nimitz praised the commission for having raised the corps to its greatest strength in history—2,811 men on August 1, 1945, or one chaplain for every 1,250 men in the navy.

Bishop Sherrill of Massachusetts, chairman of the commission, presided at the luncheon meeting.

Football Pools

London (wireless to RNS):—Gambling on football pools in Britain may be expected to soar to prewar levels of fifty million pounds ($200,000,000) annually if paper restrictions are removed and postal facilities restored, the committee of gambling of the British Council of Churches warned here in its annual report.

Russian Church

Geneva (wireless to RNS):—W. A. Visser 't Hooft, general secretary of the World Council of Churches, has left for Paris to confer with Russian Orthodox Church leaders on relations between Eastern Orthodox Churches and the international Church body. He will also meet with Marc Boegner, chairman of the World Council's administrative committee. Following his Paris visit, Visser 't Hooft will go to London for a meeting of the British Council of Churches at which he will stress the importance of promoting interest in world church co-operation efforts. In addition, he attended the international meeting of representatives of Bible societies May 6-9 at which plans were considered for an international council of Bible societies.

Professor Resigns

Hartford, Conn.: — Prof. Odell Shepard of Trinity College, Pulitzer prize winner, has resigned after serving the college for nearly thirty years. In a statement to the press he declared that he has been refused a leave of absence, without pay, for reasons of health by the new president, G. Keith Funston. Sixty-one years of age, Prof. Shepard would have been eligible for retirement on a pension in four years. College officials would make no comment on the resignation.

New Methods in Biblical Interpretation Imperatively Needed

Legend identified the lost tribes of Israel with Jacob's beloved wife, Rachel. But on the other hand, the patriarch's unloved wife, Leah, was the legendary ancestress of post-exilic Jewish writers through whom the Bible has come to us. These writers' treatment of the "Tabernacle in the Wilderness" is most remarkable and arresting:

The chief architect is a descendant of Leah. The leading donors of equipment are descended from Leah. The Tabernacle is entirely surrounded by descendants of Leah, preventing approach by Ephraimites, the sons of Rachel. Sacrifice on behalf of Israel may be offered only by priests descended from Leah. The position of honor, facing the sunrise, is held by the Leah-tribe of Judah with other Leah-tribes. But the Rachel-descended Ephraimites are ignominiously stationed on the west, or back, side of the camp. The march through the desert is headed by Judah and other Leah-tribes, to which are attributed the greatest military power; while the Ephraimites, to whom is attributed far less fighting strength, march in the rear.

On the other hand, in actual, objective history before the Exile, the Ephraimites (descended from Rachel through Joseph) are protected by Judah from the deadly enemy Edom. The tribe of Judah is wedged in between Ephraim on the north, and Edom on the south. And this pattern of authentic history is followed by legend: "Jacob sent messengers . . . unto the land of Edom; and the messengers returned saying, Esau cometh with four hundred men. . . . Then Jacob divided the people into two bands. . . . And he put Rachel and Joseph hindermost", — in the safest position, farthest from the approaching Edomites.

(An interesting Sunday afternoon can be spent in tracing out the maternal origin and history of the tribal ancestors in Genesis, chapters twenty-nine, thirty, thirty-two, thirty-three, thirty-five, verse sixteen foll.; and then comparing with tribal dispositions in the book of Numbers, chapters one, two, three, four, seven. (See Exodus, chapter thirty-one).

The meticulous arrangement of the Tabernacle as a Leah-monopoly is the response of the Jewish, priestly school to the reverse disposal of the Hebrew nation in pre-exilic history and legend. As thus depicted, the Sanctuary stands at the brilliant focus of Priestly, or ecclesiastical, narratives which, in practice, have had three effects, as follows:—to put ritual error on a plane with moral delinquency; to dim out the great Hebrew prophets behind the imposing facade of Priesthood; and to obscure Jehovah, the champion of social and economic justice, behind the outlines of a conventional Deity who is preoccupied with individual "sin".

Evolution toward One God began prior to the Babylonian Exile, under the economic pressure of social problems. But as already pointed out, the growth of monotheism in Judah after the Exile, and in the ancient and medieval Church, could not carry the weight of economic reform. This difficult paradox, however, has been in course of gradual resolution since the close of the Middle Ages; and it is rapidly approaching a climax on the international stage. A bright light is thrown on the general subject by the recently issued Cambridge Economic History (Cambridge University Press). Note the treatment of St. Chrysostom, the last of the ancient Church Fathers who dared raise the economic problem, and who knew far more about the Bible than did those who accomplished his downfall.

Loose Morals

Sydney, Australia (wireless to RNS) :—Establishment of a school of moral research in all Australian universities to "cope with lacks in ethics, religion, and citizenship" has been recommended by Canon W. J. Edwards, headmaster of Canberra Boys' Grammar School. The Anglican churchman's proposal highlighted current discussion among educators concerned over the attitude of Sydney University students who recently protested against suggested amendments to the obscene and indecent publications act. One amendment prohibits newspapers from printing "indecent medical, surgical, and physiological details" in divorce court cases.

Opposing this amendment, John Anderson, professor of philosophy in Sydney University, claimed "there is no evidence of any depravity" in the publication of so-called salacious details in newspaper reports.

John V. Duhig, professor of pathology in Queensland University, deplored "over-zealous Puritans appointing themselves public disciplinarians and banning certain literature." He denounced the ban on certain "objectionable" overseas novels by the Australian customs as "undemocratic and indefensible."

Liaison Agent

Washington:—John G. Ramsay, whose articles have appeared in THE WITNESS, has been appointed the liaison agent for religious groups in the coming drive of the CIO to organize industry in the South. Mr. Ramsay, a former steel worker, was prominent in a parish of the Presbyterian Church in Bethlehem, Pa., before taking up his present work. He is still active as a churchman and serves, among other things, as vice-chairman of the industrial division of the Federal Council of Churches.

MRS. T. W. WHITE
Churchwoman of Philadelphia

I am grateful to you for calling attention to the excellent pamphlet If I Marry a Roman Catholic issued by the Federal Council of Churches. It does seem to me desirable to point out constantly that a person marrying a Roman Catholic may have his or her convictions respected by a Roman priest if he insists. A young girl in my family, married to a devoted Catholic, made it perfectly clear that she would make no promises in regard to the religious up-bringing of any children they might have. The priest first insisted that the marriage ceremony would have to be a civil ceremony. But upon the insistence of the young couple there was a church wedding. The young couple now attend their respective churches regularly and show mutual respect for each other's convictions.

On the other hand a neighbor, recently out of the service, a Roman Catholic, fell in love with a girl who is an Episcopalian. He and his family did their best to persuade her to join the Roman Church. She refused with the breaking of their engagement resulting. It has had tragic results for the young man who is fast developing into an alcoholic. He and his family stubbornly refused to make any concessions whatever to the girl and yet now abuse her to her friends, insisting that she is "a religious bigot", "narrow-minded", etc. The whole situation could have been simply solved if they had been married by a Roman priest, which the girl was willing to be, after which they could have lived their own religious lives.

MR. J. D. RICHARDSON
Layman of Kansas City, Mo.

I noted with interest that you "Mistered" a bunch of Negro bootleggers and cut-throats in Columbia, Tennessee. Do you not also highly favor inter-marriage between white people and Negroes?

FRANCIS P. FOOTE
Rector at Burlingame, Calif.

Thank God for Canon Wedel! His article in THE WITNESS of April 4 made me want to throw my hat in the air, and shout, "This is it; let's go!" Surely the only possible place where the Anglican Church can serve the whole of Christendom is on the side of the Reformed Churches. Our big job is to be the "center of unity" of the non-Roman churches. For one thing, Rome respects only strength, not weakness, and as long as we live on the Bridge instead of making up our minds where we belong, we will be of no great value to either shore.

MARY H. THOMPSON
Churchwoman of Tucson, Arizona

Prof. Shephard in his article on Church unity (WITNESS Mar. 28) refers to the vision of my father, Dr. Huntington, in drafting the quadrilateral which the Anglican communion has adopted as its platform for unity. It is thirty-seven years since my father's death and there cannot now be many people who talked with him about the quadrilateral, but I am one of those who did. I have always remembered his description of the fourth part of it, the historic episcopate. He meant it definitely to exclude any necessary allegiance of the Episcopal Church to the apostolic succession, the historic episcopate being a fact which all can acknowledge.

I am recalling this only because one of your correspondents some time ago in his insistence on our being "the Catholic Church" included the apostolic succession among the well established beliefs of the Episcopal Church.

The Massachusetts Convention Urged to Face Issues

Various Domestic and International Issues Presented to Convention by CLID Chapter

By W. B. Spofford

Boston:—Declaring that the world is involved in a crisis, with "the task of Christians to see that it is resolved in peace under the rule of justice," the local chapter of the Church League for Industrial Democracy called upon the convention of the diocese of Massachusetts last week "to take definite stands on issues in the political and economic (both equally spiritual) spheres."

On domestic issues the memorial, which had previously been approved at a meeting of the CLID held at the Church of the Advent, pointed out that there is a critical danger of an inflationary spiral at the present time since goods are scarce and money is abundant. Minority interest groups are striving to eliminate adequate price control, hoping that they may make a large killing in the abnormal market, even though present prices guarantee adequate profits. Their action is a direct threat to our economy and leads to a devastating depression. Therefore, we urge that the O.P.A. (HR 6402) be kept without crippling amendments and, its powers extended, if necessary, during the production crisis.

There is a serious housing shortage which strikes at the heart of Christian family life. An adequate solution of this problem lies in the immediate passage of the Wagner-Ellender-Taft Bill (S. 1592) and vigorous support of the Patman Housing Bill (HR 4761) providing emergency housing for veterans.

Christianity presupposes healthy bodies for healthy souls. And yet a large number of our citizens are not receiving adequate health protection because they cannot afford to pay doctor and hospital fees. We urge strong support and the immediate passage of the Wagner-Murray-Dingell health bill (S. 1606) establishing a national health program aimed at providing adequate low-cost medical service.

Christianity subordinates secondary characteristics such as race, creed, color, country of national origin and sex and holds all equal in God's sight, deserving equal opportunities for jobs, education, voting, etc. For this basic reason, we urge the establishment of a federal Fair Employment Practices Commission (S. 101) on a permanent basis and passage of H. 400 in the state of Massachusetts. Also, we urge the passage of the anti-Poll Tax bill (HR 7) in Congress and call upon Massachusetts representatives in the national legislature to sign Discharge Petition No. 12.

The memorial was equally outspoken and concrete in dealing with international issues. After stating that "peace is indivisible as war was indivisible" the document asked the convention to urge the government to share America's food supply with the rest of the world, taking whatever means is necessary.

On relations with other nations, and specifically with the Soviet Union, the resolution declared that "As Christians, we ask this nation to recognize the same moral claims of other nations that we make for ourselves. For instance, there is justice in the Soviet Union's demand for unilateral control of the Dardanelles as long as Great Britain enjoys that privilege in the Strait of Gibraltar and the United States continues its unilateral control of the Panama Canal. Attempts by certain newspapers and individuals, such as ex-Governor Earle of Pennsylvania, to embroil this nation in an atomic war with the U.S.S.R. are sinful and anarchic. We must do all in our power to strengthen the United Nations and make it effective as an instrument for world peace and order."

The document was equally specific on the subject of Franco Spain by urging "an immediate break in diplomatic relations and a sincere effort through the United Nations to help Spain establish a democratic, peoples government."

It next urged support of the recent report of the Anglo-American commission on Palestine as "a positive step in the right direction" for the following reasons: it admits 100,000 European Jews into Palestine; it restores the equal rights of Jews to hold land in Palestine; it proposes equality of immigration quotas between Jews and Arabs.

The final paragraph of the memorial stated that "from any searching viewpoint, control of atomic fission is the number one issue of our time."

Those responsible for the petition stated that they memorialized the convention "because it is the lawful task of the Church to lead men into a new world order of peace and justice. Only Christian witness can reveal to men that post-war reconversion involves a radical social and spiritual conversion."

The convention went on record unanimously as favoring the passage of the McMahon bill and the implications of the Acheson-Lilienthal report on atomic energy. It voted unanimously that the government should requisition food, medicine and clothing for the needy peoples of the world and also called for rigorous consumer rationing here at home. The Patman housing bill and the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill establishing a national low-cost housing program were endorsed unanimously. The resolutions committee commended the CLID memorial generally and approved its distribution among the delegates.

On the matter of union with the Presbyterian Church the convention favored some definite and positive forward step at General Convention.

WEARY CONVENTION ELECTS DELEGATES

By Philip L. Shutt

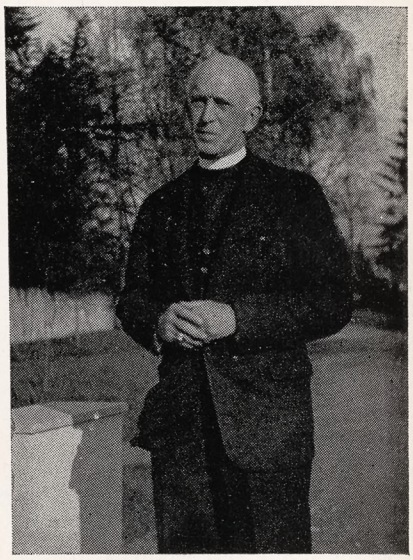
Chicago, Ill.:—The hour was 5:30 p.m., Tuesday, May 7. Exhausted delegates to the 109th annual Convention of the Diocese of Chicago sighed with relief after a full afternoon of voting on deputies to the General Convention and for other Diocesan committees. Seldom had historic, barn-like St. James' church been the scene of such tension. The issue, as everyone knew, was whether deputies would be selected who favored the Presbyterian-Episcopalian union scheme, or who opposed it. Votes were cast consequently on the basis of this issue.

Under the rules of the Convention opportunity had been fairly afforded some weeks in advance for the clergy and laity to nominate to the Secretary names for the several Diocesan committees as well as for General Convention delegates. These names, in turn, were mimeographed on a ballot form and mailed to the clergy and delegates to the Convention for their use. On the verge of the Convention a group of clergy who were opposed to the scheme of union between the two churches, discovered that its supporters had somehow been able, it was alleged, to place upon these ballots such names of persons known to be favorable to the union. Hastily they made up a slate of their own and when the time came nominated their candidates from the floor of the Convention. Due to confusion in counting the ballots it was some time before the results of the first ballot could be known. When they were announced it was found that only four of the eight clerical and lay nominees had been selected, so that a second ballot had to be taken.

Opponents and proponents of the union of the two churches marshaled their voters and on the second ballot a majority of the names selected both for regular deputies and for alternates were found to have been from those nominated as opposed to the merger. The announcement of the completed delegation was made, however, to an almost empty church, for a great number of clergy and laymen had left tired of the lengthy meeting. Because of these circumstances a special committee was appointed to report to the 1947 Convention on improved methods of voting and the selection of candidates for offices.

Celebrating his fifth year as the Diocesan, Bishop Conkling inspired an over-flow congregation on the preceding Monday night with a review of accomplishments and a program for the future.

"In five years a Diocesan debt of great proportions has been removed and at the same time the Parishes have removed an amount almost as great on their own properties . . . but our goal is more than this," he said. "We want a diocese of churches which are vital centers of daily prayer, both individual and corporate; where by revealed truth our people more and more understand the meaning of worshipping God with their own minds."



To implement this ideal the Bishop suggested the following activities: 1) open churches through the day and on certain evenings with instruction to communicants on how to use them, 2) a corporate Prayer Book Service of some kind every day where there is a resident clergyman, and held at convenient hours, 3) an end to the turmoil of talking in the Church proper at the conclusion of the Service, 4) the use of parish Retreats and Quiet Days, 5) more intensive parish calling by the clergy with assistance from lay persons, and 6) a ban upon games of "chance" such as "bingo". The Bishop also advocated week-day schools for children wherever practicable with trained teachers, and a regular and systematic program of religious education for adults.

He urged strong support of the RAF during the final months of the campaign to raise funds. "Personally we believe the national Church leaders have not lifted our sights high enough . . . throughout the home field . . . this work has languished for years through acceptance of mission support on a lower level than our common indulgences. We have spent less on advancing the Kingdom of our Lord than we have on cigarettes. Our average per capita giving within the Diocese and for the national church at home and abroad averages a little more than five cents per week per communicant!" He also pointed out that the recent allocation of $50,000 from the RAF for work among the Negroes in Chicago was made with the understanding that it was only a loan. "The gift . . . is so contingent at our request," he stated. "We want the Diocese to see clearly we are not engaged in the same old spiral of expansion without the money to pay for it."

A departure from the ordinary routine was unanimously approved by the Convention when it accepted the Bishop's recommendation that a number of clergy be selected to be the guests of the Diocese on the opening days of the General Convention, the expenses for the trip and entertainment to be taken from the large Pence Fund now in its thirteenth year.

The Convention also took under advisement a suggested ten per cent increase in clergy salaries where the salary was under $3,000.

The Rev. Dudley S. Stark, rector of St. Chrysostom's church presented a rather gloomy report for the committee on the "State of the Church". The report pointed out that there were only 371 more communicants in the Diocese in 1945 than ten years previously, and that within the city of Chicago there had been a sharp decrease. As a result of this report an interim committee was set up to study ways and means of preventing a further decline in communicant strength to report to the 1947 Convention.

Newark Cathedral Celebrates Its 200th Anniversary

It Has a Record of Notable Achievement In the Affairs of Both Church and State

By Robert Bush
Of Trinity Church, Arlington, N. J.

Newark, N. J.:—Past, present and future will share almost equally as points of emphasis in Trinity Cathedral's celebration of its 200th anniversary throughout this month. From a Crown mission in a small colonial village to the cathedral church of the sixth largest diocese in America, the two centuries of its history will be interpreted in the light of Trinity's progress as a vital force, through its steadfastness as a witness to the Living God. No major phase of that history is to be slighted but the celebration, as planned by Dean Arthur C. Lichtenberger and approved by Bishop Benjamin M. Washburn, will utilize the treasury of Trinity's past as a background, tradition and spur.

Public celebration of the anniversary was launched by the Presiding Bishop in a sermon at a parish corporate communion on Sunday, May 5. Bishop Tucker's presence emphasized by contrast the many trials, shared by Trinity with other Anglican churches in the colonies before the Revolution, resulting from lack of an American Episcopate. The Library of Congress is repository for a number of letters on the subject by Trinity's first rector, the Rev. Isaac Browne, a leader in the vain efforts of colonial clergymen to have the mother Church send bishops across the Atlantic.

The vesper service on May 5 was devoted largely to a program by Trinity choir under Albert L. Faux, director since 1913. Praise of God in the music of divers faiths and denominations has risen from Old Trinity since earliest times. In 1828 the first Roman Catholic settlers in the section were granted use of Trinity for an oratorio by the choirs of St. Patrick's Cathedral and St. Peter's Church (both of New York City) as a fund-raising project for the first Roman church in Newark. More recent examples of non-Anglican religious music in Trinity were a program of Jewish liturgical music by a cantor and quartet last fall and a vesper service program by a colored Baptist choir this winter.

The Rt. Rev. Theodore R. Ludlow, Suffragan Bishop of Newark, will continue the bicentennial program with a sermon at Morning Prayer on Sunday, May 12. His participation underscored the cathedral phase of Trinity's history, beginning with its quasi-official designation in 1917 by the late Bishop Edwin S. Lines. That somewhat anomalous status was continued by the late Bishop Wilson R. Stearly and Bishop Washburn until 1944. In that year the charter granted by King George II of England in 1746 to the "Rector, Church Wardens and Vestrymen of Trinity Church" was replaced by a corporate charter of the New Jersey Legislature, in the name of "Trinity Cathedral in Newark." The Diocesan Convention of 1944 unanimously approved the change and Trinity dates its full cathedral status from then.

Commemoration of Trinity's important role in the development of Newark—from a pre-Revolutionary hamlet of a few hundred to a great industrial city of close to half a million—was the theme of the community vesper service on May 12. The pulpit was occupied by the Rev. Lloyd Foster, minister of Old First Presbyterian Church, Newark, pioneer religious group in the community since 1666. The Anglican "newcomers" in the early 1700's were at first suspected by the congregation of Old First Church but later friendships were cemented in 1742, when a joint committee of the two parishes staked out Trinity's original half-acre plot at the north end of the Training Ground. Until after 1800, Trinity and Old First were the only churches in Newark, which today has 120.

The contributions of Trinity rectors and laymen to the progress of Newark through two centuries will be a fitting anniversary subject. As early as 1774, Trinity's first rector was a prime factor in organizing Newark Academy, one of America's oldest boys' secondary schools today. In 1791, her second rector organized the turnpike committee which linked Newark to the New York-Philadelphia stage lines and paved the way for transition from a farming settlement to a mercantile community. Throughout the 1800's, Newark's history is liberally annotated with references to Trinity's helping hand in social, economic and civic affairs.

The 1946 Diocesan Convention assembled during the anniversary celebration and the clergy and delegates from the 150 parishes and missions of the diocese were addressed by Bishop Washburn in his cathedral on the evening of May 13. He has referred to Trinity as a "mother of churches in far more than a sentimental sense," recalling that long before the Revolution it was "a center from which missionary activity extended into the western counties of the state." As a matter of record, Trinity's clergy and laity founded no less than twelve new parishes; seven in Newark itself and one each in Jersey City, Paterson, Belleville, Harrison and Orange.

Trinity's own anniversary celebration as a parish church—in which capacity it passed most of its first two hundred years—will be held at the Morning Prayer service on Sunday, May 19. Sharing the pulpit will be the two men who have served as deans and whose combined tenure spans more than a quarter of a century. Former Dean Arthur Dumper will be exceptionally qualified to speak of Trinity's transition period from parish church to cathedral. His successor, Dean Lichtenberger, may be expected to outline the great hopes and aspirations for Trinity's future in a broader field of service.

It is rather fitting that the final anniversary observance will be held in connection with the annual diocesan children's service at vespers on the 19th. Such a finale to the bicentennial celebration will serve to focus attention on the future and on those new generations, in whose lives (in Dean Lichtenberger's words) "Trinity will renew her youth and increase in vigor and usefulness."

ANGLO-CATHOLICS MEET

Philadelphia:—The priests' convention of the eastern dioceses met here at Holy Trinity, April 30-May 1 and 2, to discuss various questions to come before General Convention. The Rev. Leicester C. Lewis, vicar of St. Luke's, New York, spoke of the episcopacy, declaring that the position of the Church through the ages had been "Only he can ordain who has himself been ordained to ordain." There is very little in the discussion today that is new. All the questions emerged at the time of the Reformation and were then settled. The ordaining function of the bishop was settled at the time of the closing of the canon of holy scriptures and the adoption of the Apostles' Creed. Since that day we find bishops leading the developing life of the Church. Touching on the situation in the American Church, the speaker asked: "Why was it necessary for William White to risk the hazards of a sea voyage to England for consecration, except that the Church in Pennsylvania believed in the apostolic succession?"

The Rev. Don Frank Fenn, rector of St. Michael and All Angels' Church, Baltimore, spoke on the way to Christian unity. He counseled patient consideration of the matter of union with Presbyterians. We should not seek in a matter of nine or twelve years to heal a schism that has been developing over centuries. We should weigh the effect of such a move on the relationship between the Episcopal Church and the Eastern Orthodox Churches. The merging of 4,000,000 Protestants in the United States might interfere with a larger union with a majority of Christians throughout the world. A persistent effort for the present project might result in three Churches: Presbyterians, many of whom would not abandon the present organization; Episcopalians who would remain loyal to the Church; and those from each of these Churches who would set up a new organization.

The Rev. Walter C. Klein spoke on Christian marriage. He was chaplain in the United States navy, is now special preacher at St. Mark's Church, Philadelphia, and has just been appointed to represent the Church in the United States on the staff of the Anglican cathedral in Jerusalem. He spoke on the historical and scriptural background of the Church's marriage laws.

At the final meeting the Rev. William H. Dunphy made an address on application of the principle of Christian marriage. He declared that one of the most pressing needs of the Church is to bring its legislation into closer accord with the principle of the indissolubility of matrimony as taught by Christ. He stated that the innocent party exception is of doubtful constitutionality, and opens the door to unlimited abuses. "It is unbecoming to the dignity of the Church and her divine mission to let her children proceed on the basis of decisions in civil courts, without bringing the matter to the Church's judgment."

RUSSIAN RELIEF SUPPORTED

New York:—Funds to provide 100,000 complete outfits of clothing for Soviet war orphans were asked on May 6 at a dinner here attended by about 200 clergymen. The meeting was under the auspices of the interfaith committee of Russian Relief, Inc., of which the Rev. Ralph Sockman is chairman and Bishop Charles K. Gilbert, vice-chairman. Representing the Presiding Bishop at the meeting was the Rev. Almon Pepper, secretary of social service of the National Council. An initial gift of $15,000 was announced from the Methodist committee on overseas relief, which will buy winter clothes for 700 orphans at Pskov. The Rev. G. P. Warfield, in presenting the gift, voiced the hoped that "our small beginning" will inspire other Protestant Churches to aid "this most worthy and needy Christian effort."

Joseph E. Davies, former ambassador to the Soviet Union, called on clergymen particularly to counteract suspicions which have arisen since the war "through tolerance and the application of the altruistic principles of the great religions." Judgment of affairs must in the interest of unity be based upon full knowledge of facts, he added.

The Rev. Stanley I. Stuber, executive secretary of the world relief committee of the Northern Baptist convention, proposed that each denomination allocate funds sufficient to insure the appeal's success.

"Many of us are of the opinion that good will expressed in the form of material aid may do more to further the universal desire for peace in the world—a world which is thinking very much in terms of Soviet Russia—than any reliance upon military force, the atom bomb, or even international diplomacy," said Stuber.

Vassily Kazaniev, acting Soviet Consul General in New York, voiced the thanks of Nikolai Novikov, the Russian ambassador, for the "splendid assistance" of Americans towards the Russians' victory and rehabilitation. He was preceded by Konstantine Siminov, author of the novel, "Days and Nights," who said that "there is perfect freedom of all religion in the Soviet Union."

Among other speakers were the Rev. Robert W. Searle, general secretary of the Greater New York Federation of Churches; Israel Goldstein, former president of the Zionist organization of America; the Rev. George W. Sadler, of the Baptist foreign mission board of the Southern Baptist convention; Edward C. Carter, president of the American Society for Russian Relief, and John R. Mott, chairman of the war prisoners aid of the Young Men's Christian Association.

EDITORIALS

Editorial Policy

RECENT meetings of the WITNESS editorial board have been devoted largely to a discussion of editorial policy. A fairly lengthy statement was then prepared and presented at a meeting of the executive committee of the Church Publishing Association, for whom this weekly is published. After discussion the document was unanimously approved by both groups—not that every one of the twenty persons present subscribes one hundred percent to every word. But the views set forth are composite and reflect the consensus of convictions of the editors and also the laymen and women who serve on the C.P.A. committee. It is presented, one topic at a time over a number of weeks, as our Credo, or rather Pisteuomen—we believe.

We believe in Prayer Book revision. The Book of Common Prayer, like the Bible, needs to be revised every generation or two. For one thing, language changes, and the use of words. But more than that, the revision in 1928 was not thorough. Through indifference, or dilatoriness, the commission put off until almost the end of the process of revision the work to be done upon the Psalter; the result was that the Psalter has hardly been touched—not since 1892, or 1662, or 1549, but not since Coverdale! Perhaps we ought to wait until the new Revised Standard Version of the Old Testament is published, in another 4 or 5 years (having waited this long already!); but sooner or later the Psalter should be revised. So should the Epistles and Gospels, perhaps taking suggestions from the new RSV New Testament. This revision need not be drastic; the flavor of the old, traditional version ought to be retained, no doubt; but at least for the sake of new communicants, young and old, the translation of the Epistles and Gospels should be more intelligible. There is nothing sacrosanct about the English version. All versions of the New Testament are merely translations—i.e. all but the Greek version are merely translations made from it, and in some cases translations of translations.

If a further revision of the Prayer Book is undertaken, it ought to include revision of the collects, and especially the Offices of Baptism, Visitation of the Sick, and Holy Communion. We do not advocate this in the interest of any change in doctrine, or of any ceremonial or liturgical enrichment (of the kind proposed before 1928), but rather in the interest of simplification, brevity, and straightforward statement of thought and devotion. Much of the language of the Prayer Book, beautiful as it is, is pompous and rhetorical and reflects the Elizabethan and Jacobean courts. Some of it moves too slowly for the tempo of modern life . . . it was all right when Morning Prayer, Litany, Ante-Communion took up a good two hours, and was then followed by a sermon, with a hearty Sunday dinner at two-thirty or three, and a nice nap afterwards. But those days are not even a memory to the present generation. We need a shorter service of Holy Communion for use in chapels, schools, hospitals and where daily services are the rule.

Our convictions of Christian Reunion will be presented next week.

Amend the Canon

THE recent appearance of the Revised Standard Version of the New Testament brings a problem to some clergy who desire that Morning Prayer shall not only be solemn, but helpful. Canon 43 says that the lessons at Morning and Evening Prayer shall be from the King James' Version, including the Marginal Readings of 1901, or in the English or American Revised Version. The Revised Standard Version might seem to be permitted by this canon. After all, we have assumed that the rubric in the Book of Common Prayer about hymns and anthems permits the use of the 1940 Hymnal (which was compiled after the rubric was written.) May we not assume therefore, that Canon 43 includes the successor to the American and English Revised Versions?

It would, however, be better to change the canon to permit this usage specifically. The Revised Standard Version is dignified enough, like the King James' Version, to be read in church as it doesn't contain any distracting colloquialisms. The Moffatt and Goodspeed translations are more colloquial, like the original Greek New Testament. It would be well if the canon would specifically permit the use of the new translation.

Catholicism and Social Change

by Wilford O. Cross

Rector of St. Paul's, Kittanning, Pa.

OF ALL movements within the Episcopal Church the Anglo-Catholic party should be most socially alert. From it one ought to expect a pressure for social advance and amelioration that one could not look for in more individualistic movements like the various sorts of evangelism. A dynamic social viewpoint should logically arise from a movement that makes primary the doctrine of the Incarnation. The fact that the Word was made Flesh in a carpenter's family, sharing the daily life of a workingman's home and shop, ought in itself to make any form of catholicism sensitive to social things.

The sacramental system also with its stress on the use and value and divine significance of material things should give to Anglo-Catholic thinking a tendency to think in terms of the consecration, beyond church walls, of all the material aspects of human life. The eucharist, central to the cult of catholicism, should by its sheer predominance lead to an extension of the action at the altar to life so that out of all this should grow a fervent concern for the consecrating and handling of all bread as the bread of the altar is handled. As the bread of the altar is made holy so the making of bread for daily use, its sowing, its harvesting, its milling, its baking, its distribution, should be also a holy act, carried on in that same ethos of brotherhood and peace.

All the implications of the basic doctrines stressed in Anglo-Catholic thinking lead directly and irrevocably to a philosophy of social improvement. The Church as the divine community is the nucleus and germ of the Kingdom of God. Even the sacrament of Baptism itself is capable of great social interpretation, for it removes a child from the world as it is constituted and places it in the environment of a new and conspiratorial society.

However, the fact remains, and it is a strange fact, that, save for a few prophetic voices, Anglo-Catholicism has shown little real interest in social progress and social change. There has been more of that interest in England. There have been a few brilliant exceptions here. But mostly the interest of the movement has been in the shape of chasubles rather than in the cut of society.

And this is a mystery. Why should there be so little carry-over of the obvious social implications of creed and cult? The social import of doctrinal catholicism is immense and undeniable. Why don't those who hold the mass dear go on to discover in their hearts an equal love for the masses? Is Anglo-Catholicism all decadent aesthetism, and ceremonial? Does the smell of the incense cover up the reek of a rotten social order?

The mystery deepens when one puts Anglo-Catholicism in its larger setting of catholicism as a whole. First, there is Orthodoxy, the Eastern Church, which since the time of Constantine in the year 312, has been Caesaro-papal—that is to say has been headed and governed by a secular czar or emperor rather than an ordained pope. The czar inherited the ecclesiastical powers assumed by Constantine, and the Eastern Church, being bound, at least as far as the Russian Church was concerned, to his throne, became reactionary, and when the test came, and revolution was at hand, threw in its lot with the counter-revolution and the enemies of the people. The whole structure and tone of the Church was orientated to keeping the peasants in line and serving as an opiate for poverty. The kingdom of the czar crowded out the ideal of the Kingdom of God. Orthodoxy was socially blind and unprogressive and in the long run denied its Lord and his gospel by warming its hands at the fire in the outer court. When the cock of revolution crew thrice the Church went out into the night of bitter exile and persecution.

IN THE West, historic, catholic Christianity has an even worse record. Even though in the middle ages, through the trade guilds and the doctrine of the just price, and the feudal contract, the medieval Church was a remedial influence, with the breakup of Christendom into national states, catholicism became in each nation a force of reaction allied with whatever despotism was uppermost. Since the Council of Trent Catholicism has come almost eagerly to the aid and comfort of tyranny.

One need not go outside of North America to see how tragically unprogressive catholicism is. To the north is Quebec and to the south Mexico. Both are dominated socially by the Roman Church. In both of these regions social conditions are obviously worse than in neighboring regions having the same climate and the same economy. A low standard of human living persists in both Mexico and

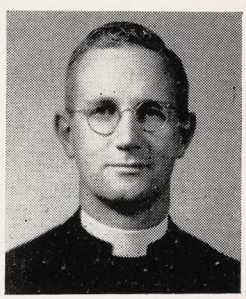
Quebec and in both countries the Church is at the bottom of the riddle. In both countries an illiterate peasantry is kept living in shacks and hovels. Education is discouraged and perverted. Large, burdensome families are the rule. Labor unions are undermined. The vote is sabotaged. New inventions are discouraged and new ways of life are ruled out. Any movement that would lead to the abundant life is rigidly outlawed. Catholicism is here the enemy of all human decency.

Beyond the Atlantic it is even easier to lift the skirt of the cassock and find the cloven hoof. Once, against Black and Tanism, the Church in Ireland was a revolutionary force but it has settled down in Eire to become the enemy of education and of change. The Church in France surrendered more rapidly than the Maginot Line to the invader. In Italy the Church played into the hands of Mussolini. In Germany it resisted but only sufficiently to preserve some shadow of its institutional strength. In Spain its alliance with the Franco brigandage is a crying shame for Christianity, for the Church sold out her gospel in order that her lands would not be given to the peasants. The political affiliations of the current pope, with his unspeakable dubbing of Hitler and Mussolini as "the twin hammers of God" are a stench in the nostrils of Christianity and he has used the Vatican as a center of world-wide Fascist intrigue, and is, even now, with his lust to declare a holy war on communism, a perpetual menace to the peace of the world.

By and large, the globe over, Catholicism seems to feel most at home in a world dominated by tyranny. It is the avowed foe of anything like a democratic, peoples' world. It insists upon reducing religion to an opiate of personal salvation. It becomes the cult of death rather than the cult of the abundant life. Voltaire's impassioned cynicism, that there could be no liberty for man on earth until the last tyrant had been strangled with the entrails of the last priest is tragically true.

Catholicism holds all of the gospel, including the gospel of human brotherhood, and the Kingdom, and the gospel of the abundant life in its heart. The trouble is, essentially, that the institution, the shell, in which this gospel lives and is carried and preserved, outgrows the living organism within. The Church exists for the gospel, but in catholicism, the Church eventually encrusts the gospel with the rigidities of its calcified life. The institution becomes of more import than the teaching. The paper is of more value than the message. The shell of the snail, to return to the earlier metaphor, becomes too heavy and burdensome for the frail creature within. The Church, which is the Body of Christ, grows too heavy for his spirit. The institution takes on a life of its own apart from his life. The Church becomes virtually a pagan force, dedicated to a secular philosophy of power and survival. Christ is sold for thirty pieces of silver.



This is the historic tragedy of catholicism. And by that tragedy is well nigh lost to the world all the riches of the ancient gospel. What is always needed, what is lacking now these many days, is a new anti-clericalism, a new Franciscanism, a new wave of prophecy burning in the heart of catholicism, a Lollardry that will go forth into the slumways and highways to preach the Kingdom. Perhaps God will stir this life again in the dead sepulchre of catholicism. If it does this magnificent religion re-Christianized, awake once more to the implications that lie at the heart of its doctrine, will become the friend rather than the enemy of humanity, and the Kingdom will not then be so far from us.

WHAT is the purpose of the parish? For me it has been most clearly stated by Davies in Down Peacock's Feathers. In the chapter entitled, "Christ's revelation of the meaning of history," he says, "To bring men and women into repentance, to initiate them into a new life, to start them on a new career in which altruism displaces egoism as the natural tendency is the end to which history is working. This is what Christ means for history, and what history means for the Christian. The ultimately significant thing in history is the repentance of individual men and women. 'There is more joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth than over ninety-nine just men.' The things that impress the world, the great events, the movements, the cataclysms, the revolutions, the pomps and panoplies, are important only in their relation to the experience of personal repentance. And this never strikes the headlines. But it is the thing that supremely matters."

A parish has other purposes—worship, prayer, the study of God's word, prophesy, and service. Furthermore, the purpose of a parish can be stated, in terms of these activities. William Temple said, "This world can be saved from political chaos and collapse by one thing only, and that is worship." Jesus said, "I am among you that serveth" and "Whosoever wishes to be great among you shall be your servant; and whosoever wishes to be first among you shall be your slave." Again, "Thus saith the Lord God, Let my people go." He still speaks the same words to any parish where men are held in economic, political, cultural or any kind of bondage.

In the last analysis, however, it seems to me that the one purpose which will include all others and will at the same time distinguish the parish as a true part of the redemptive society is the purpose of bringing men to repentance. Only occasionally is this the central working purpose of our parishes. We tend to regard ourselves as the Society for the Preservation and Protection of the Ninety and Nine or we tend to lose our identity in competition with social and recreational institutions. If the present disintegration of parish life is to be halted and that life strengthened and reinvigorated, we must make "the experience of personal repentance" the end of our strategy and develop all our tactics with it in mind.

For Good and Not Evil

by Henry Harmon Chamberlin

A Non-Churchman of Worcester, Massachusetts

IF I WERE a clergyman to preach a sermon on the atomic bomb I would take my text from the first book of Kings, "And behold the Lord passed by and a great and strong wind rent the mountains and brake in pieces the rocks before the Lord; but the Lord was not in the wind; and after the wind an earthquake; but the Lord was not in the earthquake; and after the earthquake a fire; but the Lord was not in the fire; and after the fire a still small voice" and that, according to the scriptures, was the voice of the Lord.

My sermon would come under three heads. First I would point out that as the Lord was neither in the wind nor the earthquake nor the fire, so he could not be present today in the atomic bomb. For the atomic bomb is a product of nuclear research, and nuclear research is a branch of science, and science, being the process of investigation into the facts of the material universe, has nothing to do with morality as such. Morality has to do solely with spiritual values. Science can show you how to split the atom but it cannot show you the difference between right and wrong. That is the province of morality and of religion. Hence we can see how fatuous are the remarks of an editorial writer in the Osservatore Romano who asserts that nuclear science is impious because it would lay bare the secrets of the creator. And equally inane is the assertion that the atomic bomb has been given into our hands as a sacred trust. The Lord would hardly be annoyed by any scientific discovery. You might as well believe in the old Hellenic myth that Zeus was angry with Prometheus for giving fire to mankind. Nor is it very probable that the Lord appeared before the scientists in Oak Ridge and Los Alamos and handed them over the atomic bomb as it is related that he gave the ten commandments to Moses on Mt. Sinai. We must bear in mind that nuclear science is neither moral nor immoral. For morality and immorality are in our own minds, and not in the world of matter.

So we would come to the second heading of my sermon. How can we use this discovery for the betterment of ourselves and the rest of the world? It is here that morality enters into the discussion. How can we use this momentous and formidable discovery for good and not for evil? Presumably most Americans want to use it for good. How can it be so used?

We can easily tell how it cannot be used with advantage to ourselves nor to anybody else. We have been told that America must keep the atomic bomb a secret, something like a patent medicine or a beauty cream. But specialists in nuclear research have conclusively proved that this is impossible. Congress has introduced a bill to put nuclear research into the hands of a congressional committee whose members would restrict the science in question and ban publicity. This method of treatment is quite as ridiculous as the action of a clerical coterie who once forbade Gallileo to believe in a revolutionized astronomy and denied him the use of the telescope because it was heretical. There have been many attempts to stop the onward march of science and all of them have ignominiously and deservedly failed.

Another suggestion is to outlaw the bomb and to send commissions over the face of the habitable globe to report on any attempts to produce atomic weapons and so to prevent their manufacture. Such attempts would have about as good a chance for success as our former prohibition agents had when they tried to prevent the sale of liquor. The most these tactics could accomplish would be to end their manufacture among honest and peace loving peoples and put it into the hands of clandestine aggressors. Then we would awake some fine morning to wholesale calamity. Montaigne once said that we are all under sentence of death with a sort of indefinite reprieve. Only in this case the indefinite reprieve would be cancelled, and the sentence would be sudden, swift and sure. Moreover the prohibition of atomic energy for destructive purposes, and its encouragement for constructive purposes are equally futile; for it is impossible to ascertain where destruction leaves off and construction begins. Without a world government firmly rooted in popular approval, our chances of escaping and surviving an atomic war are slim indeed.

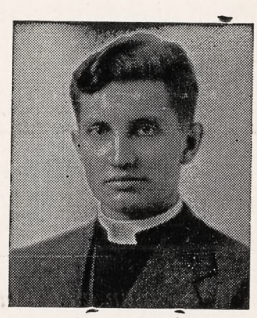
BUT how near have we come to a world government? That question answers itself. World government is like Mark Twain's weather. Everybody talks about it, but up to now, nobody has done anything about it. A step in the right direction would be to knock Franco and Peron off their perches. For we know that Franco has a number of Nazi scientists active in nuclear research and that Peron and his colonels, who have recently prohibited the export of uranium, have at their disposal a swarm of Nazi specialists who will labor for a comeback with a right good will. But beyond a few tepid expressions of disapproval, we leave both these foul birds to their own atomic devices, and there is little doubt that both are busily hatching a malignant atomic egg.

Meanwhile the British lion and the Russian bear are snarling at each other, the lion clutching at the Mediterranean and the status quo ante in the orient, and the bear holding all he can of eastern Europe and western Asia; while the American eagle flutters over their heads in wavering and uncertain circles and squawks out "naughty, naughty" to both, while keeping a weather and possessive eye on Japan and the coast of China, and strategic islands in the Pacific. This is not a very edifying spectacle for the peoples of the world. The Lord is not to be found in the cross fire of protocol nor in the hot air of nineteenth century diplomacy, nor in power politics and spheres of influence, obsolete already in the light of nuclear research. We need world government desperately and quickly, too, and there is no statesman extant to show us how this can be obtained.



So, for my third heading, I may mention one means of attainment, as old as Christianity itself. It is a simple method and easily comprehended. It is the golden rule, so often preached and so seldom practiced. "Do unto others as ye would that they should do unto you." Whatever creed or cult we may profess, there is no better solution for our troubles. But if we would apply the golden rule to international policy we must begin by applying it at home. So far as in us lies we must purge ourselves of avarice and hatred of hypocrisy and this unfortunately is easier said than done.

Jointly or severally these undesirable qualities are made manifest to us in corrupt business, corrupt politics, race discrimination, Russophobia, Anglophobia and the desecration of the grave of our late president. We need to mend our manners before we presume to tell other nations what they ought to do. For example, we must see to it that labor and management lay aside their selfish internecine war and work together for the public good. Then we should call together the representatives of all freedom loving peoples and agree on the definite framework of a workable plan for mutual benefit. Perhaps we shall find that the fear of the atomic bomb is the beginning of wisdom. That is our only hope in these days of uncertainty and mortal danger.

Dramatic Arts and Religion

By
WILLIAM B. SPOFFORD, JR.

THE Gestapo chief of Rome was speaking to Don Pietro, partisan and priest of one of the local churches, while, in the next room, his strong-arm boys were beating to death a veteran of the Loyalist forces in Spain. The purpose was to get either the priest or the veteran to give the Gestapo the names of the leaders of the Italian underground. Speaking to the priest, he says: "You can't trust him. He's a Communist; he's an atheist; he hates religion. He'll turn against you. Speak and save yourself." In answer, Don Pietro says: "I can't speak. God works in mysterious ways."

Going into the next room, the chief speaks to the beaten Manfredi: "Speak, fool. These churchmen and monarchists will sell you out. They'll collaborate with you now but they'll turn against you sooner or later. Speak and I'll grant you freedom and your party immunity." In answer, the Spanish veteran spits in his face.

Open City was made in Rome just as the Allied forces were capturing the city. Dealing with the work of the Italian underground during the war, it is a glorious tribute to the hidden allies all over Europe. All of the leading characters are killed before the picture ends—and yet they come forth victorious. The Communist is beaten to death, after being betrayed by his lover; the priest is shot by the firing squad; the pregnant fiancee of the underground leader is shot down in the street. It is a brutal picture and portrays a type of life that we have never known in this country. And, yet, its honesty and power overwhelms one. Without the typical Hollywood heroics and released from the curse of American censorship, Open City stands out as a great motion picture.

Superbly acted by a company of non-professionals, the film has been widely acclaimed wherever it has been shown—and justly so. The characters of the priest and the Spanish veteran are, of course, central and they are sharply drawn. Working hand in hand in the partisan movement, we find the atheist and the priest both discovering a power and a sense of comradeship. The atheist would call it "the greatness of personality" while the priest would call it "The Holy Spirit." But, although they both jump off from different points, we find them ending up in the same place—the grave—and ending up there as friends who understand and love each other.

Because of its emphasis on important values, Open City should be seen by all adult churchmen. Because of the brutal, but honest, scenes, the children ought to be kept away. It has a great lesson for the rest of us, however! A lesson dealing with true unity and true cooperation which makes the headlines and editorials that we read in the daily press seem disgusting and tawdry.

_Woman as a Force in History_: A Study in Traditions and Realities by Mary R. Beard. Macmillan. $3.50.

To a reader unacquainted with Mrs. Beard's writings, this book offers two astonishments: first, that so serious and profound a study should prove extremely readable; second, that such deep and globe-girdling research could be so clearly distilled.

Mrs. Beard examines "the tradition that women were members of a subject sex throughout history," tests the idea of subjection "by reference to historical realities," looks into the idea of equality, and finally outlines "the kind of studying, writing, and teaching which I believe to be mandatory if a genuine interest in understanding human life is to be cultivated."

Looking into law, social life, politics, working conditions, family life, philosophies, intellectual life, religious practices, Mrs. Beard shows that "the force of woman was a powerful factor in all the infamies, tyrannies, liberties, activities and aspirations that constituted the history of this stage [from modern times running back into and through the medieval ages of western feudalism and Christian contests with barbarism] of humanity's expression." Her generalization is based on facts, actual historical instances of named people in given countries at stated times, with the careful weighing and checking of the sound historian. The reader learns in the first few chapters that he may wholly trust the author's historical integrity and objective judgment; that she will not drag women out of their historical surroundings either to damn or bless them. Consequently the book concerns itself almost as much with men as with women. ". . . The civilization of men and women occurs in society, and all the agencies used in the process—language, ideas, knowledge, institutions, property, arts, and inventions—are social products, the work of men and women indissolubly united by the very nature of life, in a struggle for a decent and wholesome existence against the forces of barbarism and pessimism wrestling for the possession of the human spirit."

One could wish that Mrs. Beard had summarized at the end in her lucid style "the kind of studying, writing, and teaching which I believe to be mandatory if a genuine interest in understanding human life is to be cultivated." Her ideas come forth both directly and by implication in every chapter, but they would gain force by being grouped.

For the fair-minded historian writing on any age from primitive times down, for the social scientist seeking a true picture of women's upholding "*civil*ization in the struggle with barbarism," for the ordinary men and women wishing to understand more clearly our present life and its roots in the past, this book is mandatory.

Radical Changes in the Church Are Asked By British

Discovery of Atomic Energy Forces Church To Re-Examine Relationship to Social Life

Edited by Sara Dill

London (wireless to RNS):—The discovery of atomic energy forces the Church to re-examine the relationship of the Christian faith to social and political life, according to a report presented here to the British Council of Churches. Entitled "The Era of Atomic Power," the report commends, quotes, and partly parallels a report made to the Federal Council of the Churches at its special session in Columbus, Ohio, last March.

Prepared by a 15-man commission headed by J. H. Oldham, the British report asserted "something radical must happen to the Church," and warned that although it is impossible to foresee what changes will be required, the Church must be ready to adopt new ways if it hopes to exercise moral and spiritual leadership in the era of atomic power. The commission said it had no practical proposals for action at this time, partly because "possible action is too wide and varied for adequate discussion within the present report," and partly because it feels that the crisis is so deep that it should first be allowed to "penetrate into our whole consciousness and do its work at the deepest levels."

The report was divided into three main sections dealing with the control of atomic energy, the psychological effect of its discovery, and the attitude toward life and society that Christians must choose in the new atomic age. Discussing problems of atomic bomb control, the report warned against the ""too-easy confidence" reflected in the declaration of statesmen and scientists. "It is widely assumed," it said, "that, providing the atomic bomb can be brought under control, the new sources of energy will be used for good. In most utterances of public men and scientists, there is hope for the future if only the danger of war can be overcome. The grounds for this unhesitating optimism are far from self-evident. The misuse of earlier sources of power like coal and oil should guard us against a too-easy confidence that the enormously enhanced powers at man's disposal will necessarily be turned to wise uses. The industrial evolution brought about by the substitution of one source of power for another will call for economic and social readjustments that will tax to the utmost man's intelligence, magnanimity and devotion to the public good."

Declaring there is widespread skepticism as to the possibility of averting war "with all its new horrors," the report stressed that "In the minds of many young people there is a feeling akin to despair, a belief that for them political action is futile, for they are helpless in the grip of forces quite beyond their control."

Unilateral renunciation of the use of the atomic bomb, the report said, would be a renunciation also of a nation's defensive power and would be an abandonment rather than an extension of democratic principles. "The achievement of democracy has been to curb and discipline power, not to abolish it," the report stated.

It listed three fundamental attitudes between which men must choose in facing the problem of bringing about a society in which the possession of atomic power will no longer be a ground for fear. These were: acceptance of "secular futurism," which includes reliance on social engineering as the chief means of improving society; withdrawal to the contemplative life; or responsible citizenship.

The report declared that "secular futurism" holds the danger that "love of power, tinged with something akin to religious devotion and power mysticism" may develop, while withdrawal as a general rather than an individual vocation "is to deny the significance of politics and to despair of civilization."

Asserting that the third alternative, responsible citizenship, means saving political democracy from perishing, the report added: "The Church has a special mission for drawing upon the inexhaustible resources of its own faith, to restore men's confidence in endeavors by which power is progressively brought under social control and made subservient to the end of justice, and by which the rights and liberties of individuals are secured and preserved."

Members of the commission, in addition to Dr. Oldham, were: "The Rev. M. E. Aubrey, Prof. John Baillie, Robert Birley, Mrs. Katherine Bliss, Bishop G. K. A. Bell of Chichester, Dr. Newton Flew, the Rev. Norman Goodall, Kenneth Grubb, Canon Cyril Hudson, Donald Mackinnon, Sir Walter Moberly, Professor A. D. Richie, Dennis Ruth, and Mrs. Mary Stocks.

To Russian Zone

Geneva (wireless to RNS):—Arrangements have been made for the first shipment of relief supplies to the Russian occupation zone of Germany through the World Council of Churches. Forty-three tons of sugar, purchased from funds provided by the Missouri Lutheran Synod, will be shipped from Basel on an international Red Cross train.

Newark Offering

Newark: — Several hundred churchwomen of the diocese of Newark will gather at Trinity Cathedral tomorrow, May 17, for the spring presentation of the United Thank Offering. The celebrant is to be Bishop Washburn; the preacher, the Rev. R. S. Trenbath, former army chaplain.

Still in Service

New York:—There are 207 Episcopal chaplains still in service. There have been 334 separated from service to date, with 252 of these having found employment in parishes or elsewhere. There are 82 former chaplains still seeking jobs. The commission on chaplains reported a slowing down of expenditures, with a balance on hand as of April 23 of $209,712.

Million Dollar Attack

Minneapolis: — An attack on the Federal Council of Churches was coupled with an appeal for a million dollars at the convention of the National Association of Evangelists, meeting here. It came in a report by the secretary of the organization. Said he: "The National Association of Evangelicals has no reason for existence if it fails to make clear its repudiation of the false doctrines of modernism which are endorsed and propagated by several of the interdenominational organizations of this country, notably the Federal Council of the Churches. Men who deny the deity of Christ, the virgin birth, the miracles of our Saviour, the efficacy of his shed blood to save us from our sins, his physical resurrection and his personal return in power and glory are not Christians, but are lost and doomed sinners in need of repentance even though they may occupy places of honor in the Church. Our effort must ever be to purge our Churches of these pagans and to give ourselves earnestly to prayer for revival."

Goes to Japan

New York:—Bishop Charles L. Reifsnider, formerly bishop of North Kwanto, sailed on May 1 for Japan to confer with Japanese Church leaders and with deputations from the Church on England and the Church in Canada, on the future of the Church in Japan.

Layman Opposes Union

Denver, Colo.:—Mr. W. W. Grant, chancellor of the diocese of Colorado, speaking last week at one of the series of seven meetings sponsored by the American Church Union, declared that the proposed union of the Episcopal and Presbyterian Churches was legally impossible. Mr. James H. Pershing, former chancellor, declared that Episcopalians who might refuse to go along with the merger could legally claim millions of dollars worth of Church property. The conference was held at St. John's Cathedral.

Another of the meetings was held, also last week, in Dallas, and resulted in a petition being sent to the Presiding Bishop stating that the plan for union should be considered at General Convention but that it should not be voted upon until a sufficient time had been allowed for study of the question. (The proposal for Presbyterian-Episcopal union was first put forward sixty years ago.)

Congressmen Paid

Cambridge, Mass.:—A veteran's experience and imagination were combined by Ward McCabe, student at the Episcopal Theological School here from Kentucky, when he sent a letter to his Congressmen and Senators urging them to support the OPA in the struggle to control inflationary forces at work in the American economy. McCabe, a former officer of intelligence in the far east branch of the Office of Special Services, and before the war a member of the FBI, said in his letters that in China only last year he had seen inflation with all its evils close at hand. He said, "your salary, if paid in Chinese currency, would now be $5.00 a year. To illustrate the point, I enclose it in the form of two five-thousand dollar bills." Just to drive the point home, he presented each Congressman with extra one-hundred dollar bills as cigar-lighters. "Are you willing," he asked, "to see this happen in America?"

Secretary Resigns

London (wireless to RNS):—The Rev. Archibald C. Craig has resigned as general secretary of the British Council of Churches, it was announced last week by the Archbishop of Canterbury. He has accepted the position of assistant to the Rev. George MacLeod in the work of the Iona Community in Scotland. It is expected that he will be replaced by two secretaries, one representing the Church of England and the other the Free Churches.

Discuss Family

Detroit:—A panel discussion on the Christian family was a feature of a joint meeting of the Girls Friendly Society and the Auxiliary of the diocese of Michigan, meeting at St. John's, April 29. The day before, the annual festival service of the GFS was held at the cathedral, with Mrs. Helen Hogue, national vice-president, as speaker.

Pleads for Homeless

New York:—Mrs. Mary K. Simkhovitch, for many years the head of Greenwich House and a member of the board of directors of the CLID, believes the United States should relax immigration restrictions and give full support to the United Nations efforts to establish "humane and proper planning of all international migration." She was a headliner at the three day conference held here last week by the National Council of Women. "The question of homelessness," she said, "is brought home to us here in America in a most realistic way by returning veterans who are unable to find living quarters. If countless people are coming home to homelessness in America, how much vaster is the problem in the world as a whole? And if here in America with its great resources and its immediate possibilities there are still forces hostile to securing this basic right for our own veterans, how infinitely more drastic is the need for a solution for the wider world problem."

While the United States should open her door wider than other countries, Mrs. Simkhovitch said that the problem of the displaced person can only be solved through the co-operative effort of the United Nations.

College Workers

New York:—A meeting of college workers is to be held tomorrow, May 17, at Columbia University under the auspices of the committee on college work of the 2nd province. Speakers: the Rev. Robert N. Rodenmayer, chaplain at Smith College; the Rev. J. Clemens Kolb, chaplain at the University of Pennsylvania; the Rev. George E. Rath, chairman of the commission.

Calls for Leaders

Washington:—Bishop Angus Dun in his convention address last week called for new leaders among the laity. He questioned whether it is wise "to freeze the situation in such a way that the same people are used again and again" in the executive council and departments of the diocese and also on vestries.

Youth Meeting

Charleston, S. C.:—About 200 young people, clergy and counselors met here May 3-5 in a youth convention on the theme of what it means to be a Christian. The addresses were by Bishop Carruthers, the Rev. David W. Yates, student chaplain at the University of North Carolina and the Rev. A. P. Chambliss Jr., student chaplain at Winthrop College.

Deny Charge

London (wireless to RNS):—Criticism of the World Council of Churches for setting up a department on world affairs was discounted here by W. A. Visser 't Hooft, general secretary of the international Church body, in an address before the spring meeting of the British Council of Churches. He also denied that the World Council brought pressure on German Church leaders to sign the Stuttgart statement which acknowledged the Churches' share in the nation's war guilt.

Replying to assertions that the World Council has "bitten off more than it can chew" by setting up a department on international affairs, Visser 't Hooft commended the work which the American commission on a just and durable peace and other religious groups have done nationally in this field, but declared that international questions cannot be dealt with nationally.

"The whole point of having a World Council," he said, "is to see that subjects which exist on a world scale are dealt with on a world scale."

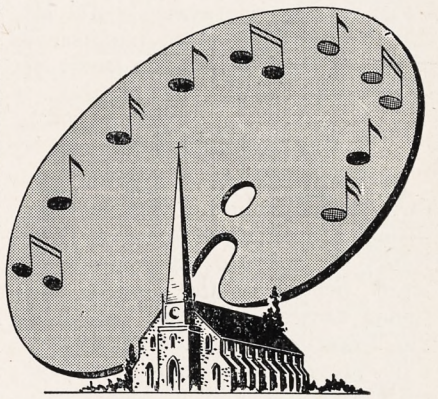
He refuted assertions that the war-guilt statement drawn up by German Church leaders at Stuttgart last Fall was made as a result of an ultimatum by the World Council that if they failed to announce their repentance "there would be no room for them in ecumenical fellowship."

"The repentance statement of the German Church leaders developed out of a spontaneous act on their part," he declared.

Hunger Diet

Natick, Mass. (RNS):—In an effort to prod his congregation into reducing their food consumption and increasing their contributions to overseas relief, the Rev. Albert K. Herling, minister of Unity church here, has gone on a "hunger diet" of 1,000 calories a day. The 31-year-old Unitarian minister, who also is a student at Crane Theological School of Tufts College, Boston, said he began his diet because "I wanted to do something in my town which would show the visible effects of such a diet." He added that he had gone "as far as the spoken word can take me" in efforts to get people to lower their consumption of food.

Oppose Unity



Chicago: — Those attending the regional conference held here under the auspices of the American Church Union heard the proposed union of the Episcopal and Presbyterian Churches denounced as "unrealistic and contrary to the Episcopal concept of sacramental religion." Bishop Conkling of Chicago in his address on the marriage canon warned those present that they must not accommodate the Christian truth on

Urge Conservation

Washington: — Churches throughout the District of Columbia observed food conservation days May 10-12, with clergymen of all churches speaking on the importance of saving food to help the needy of Europe and Asia.

Evangelicals Meet

Berkeley, Calif.: — Bishop Sanford, retired bishop of San Joaquin, Bishop Kinsolving of Arizona, Dean Henry H. Shires of the Church Divinity School of the Pacific, and Canon Lovgren of Grace Cathedral, San Francisco, were the speakers at a meeting of the Episcopal Evangelical Fellowship, meeting here May 3 following the synod of the province. The topics discussed were Church unity and the marriage canons.

Church Congress

Hendersonville, N. C.:—A regional Church Congress was organized at St. James' Church here on April 30-May 1. Those who read papers and led discussions were the Very Rev. William H. Nes, Mr. F. W. Ewbank and Mr. George W. Valentine. Bishop Gribbin was present to express his satisfaction that the diocese of Western North Carolina was the first in the South to so organize.

Burn Mortgage

Kansas City, Mo.:—For a number of years St. George's, here, has been raising funds to clear its mortgage. But it looked as though Rector Charles R. Tyner would not be at the service on Palm Sunday to put the match to the document. He had been severely injured in an auto accident a few days before. However he was brought from the hospital on a stretcher and performed that part of the ceremony. The sermon was by the Rev. Richard L. Harbor, former navy chaplain.

Tulsa, Okla. (RNS): — A new church designed exclusively for deaf mutes will be dedicated here in June when deaf mutes from throughout the country meet in convention. The Church of the Silent Sheep welcomes all deaf persons regardless of their religious beliefs. All preaching, teaching — and even singing — are conducted in sign language.

The congregation, organized in 1939, has been meeting in another church with Mrs. LaVona Thompson acting as minister. Once a month the group is addressed by a deaf-mute evangelist. Mrs. Thompson hopes that as the congregation increases a full-time minister can be secured.

Japanese Churches

Tokyo (wireless toRNS): — The first step in the plans for the rehabilitation of the churches of the Anglican communion in Japan were announced at a service held here May 12, calling for the rebuilding of seventeen churches destroyed or severely damaged. The service was sponsored by the Presiding Bishop of the Church in Japan, the Rt. Rev. Paul S. Sasaki, with the sermon preached by Bishop Michael Yaskiro of Kobe. Six other bishops attended the service.

Religious Educators

Chicago:—Religious educators of the midwest are to hold a conference here May 21-23 under the auspices of the national department. Leaders include Bishop Angus Dun of Washington; Prof. Adelaide Case of the Episcopal Theological School; the Rev. Daniel McGregor, head of the department.

Hits Prudishness

Richmond, Va.:—The Rev. Beverley M. Boyd, social service secretary of the Federal Council of Churches and a member of the editorial board of THE WITNESS, told clergymen attending the Virginia Council of Churches that they take "too prudish an attitude" toward the venereal disease problem. He stated that it is one in which the ministry must join hands with the medical profession and the law.

Role of Youth

Geneva (wireless to RNS):—Four international Christian organizations have issued a joint statement here stressing the importance of youth's role in world reconstruction. The statement was prepared in connection with the second world conference of Christian youth to be held in Europe next year. The first world conference was held at Amsterdam in 1939, but no decision has yet been made as to where the second conference will take place.

The joint statement was released by the international YMCA, the international YWCA, the World's Student Christian Federation, and the World Council of Churches. Details of the conference will be discussed at a meeting of international youth leaders in Geneva next July.

Present plans for the world gathering anticipate a meeting of 1,300 young people between the ages of 18 and 30, with allocation between the countries represented similar to that of the Amsterdam conference. The theme of the conference will be, "One Lord, One World," and present indications are that it will be convened in one of the northern European countries.

The statement declared that throughout the war years there have been "insistent and increasing demands on the part of Christian youth in many countries to hold a world conference."

"Many groups," it said, "have been planning for it in their own programs of discussions. Others lived through dark and terrible days in anticipation of this reunion in the name of Christ.

"The conference will be the stage for the far wider process through which Christian youth throughout the world will give common consideration to its calling and its tasks, in the world. There will be no question of this event being a 'flash in the pan.' It will be an expression of a world-wide movement among young people and Christian church lay organizations."

Council Criticized

Akron, O. (RNS): — Criticism of the Federal Council of Churches for its refusal to admit the Universalist Church of America to membership was voiced here by Robert Cummins, general secretary of the Church, and the Rev. Emory S. Bucke, Boston, editor of Zion's Herald, Methodist publication. In his annual report delivered at the biennial general assembly of the Church, Cummins charged that the Federal Council "is one more of the world's mentally regimented voices. The Federal Council upholds the ancient and dishonorable doctrine of 'the elect of God.' The Council, therefore, is a creedal body; its pattern of fellowship excludes."

Reviewing the history of the denomination's application, he said that it was first made in 1941, adding that at the Council's meeting in Pittsburgh in 1944 member Churches of the Council voted 12-6 not to discuss the application.

"From the beginning we have been motivated only by our desire to join hands with other Churches in a program of good works," he said. "This, as we understand it, was the purpose of the Council. In fact, the Council's own constitution and by-laws specifically forbid the application of any creedal test."

Formation of a new council composed only of "liberal" churches is not desirable, Cummins said, because such a council would be "equally creedal and exclusive." He called on Universalists to adopt an attitude of "patience and goodwill, not vacillation" in regard to the Federal Council.

Bucke called upon the Universalist Church to take the lead in a general, world-wide "return to Protestantism." He said Universalists can and should lead in the swing back to the ideals of Protestantism's founders because of the rejection of the Church's application by the Federal Council. The refusal of the Federal Council, he asserted, "is, in my opinion, a strong indication that even in our comity we become clerical and theological." He declared that the Universalist application was turned down because "of a few individuals in the Council who did not like your theological interpretation of the place of Jesus Christ."

If the Federal Council is to become a powerful force in united Christian action, Bucke said, "there must be a reform that will bring us away from theological bickering into the larger field of social action. Calling for a "purification" of the Council, Bucke said that "if it means that reactionary and conservative churches must depart from the Federal Council, I would be very sorry.

THE undersigned, one time Secretaries for College Work of the National Council, have formed a committee to encourage the preparation, reprinting and distribution of literature, from books to tracts, through the Canterbury Clubs in the colleges, and in the Church at large.

We invite correspondence, as to matter of any length that should be printed or reprinted, and as to material needed. We also would welcome offers of assistance from those interested in helping.

Why Such a Rush?

When we suggest that you order your Bundle for General Convention as early as this we do so for two reasons:

1. The Convention is early in September. Order now so that you will not neglect it during the summer.

2. There are still paper shortages and so we will be limited in the number of copies we can print. We will enter the orders as they are received—first come, first served. As we plan things at the moment there will be five General Convention Numbers, one a Pre-Convention Number giving valuable information about the Convention questions, places to visit, etc. This will be followed by four numbers giving complete reports of the Convention.

"But the fact that reactionary and conservative churches already have left the Council indicates their refusal to be part of an ecumenical Protestantism that is geared to meet the chaos and degeneracy of our world."

Maine Students to Meet

Waterville, Me.:—Members of the Canterbury Clubs of the Maine colleges are to hold a conference at Colby College, May 18-19, with Miss Barbara Arnold, head of college work in New England; the Rev. Bradford Johnson of Brunswick, Me., and the Rev. Jesse Trotter of Amherst, Mass., as the speakers.

New Social Agency

Akron, O.:—A new Protestant social agency to take care of an increasing postwar rise in welfare problems in this industrial city has been proposed by the Akron ministerial association. The Association revealed its plans when it asked the united community chest here to help financially in operating such an agency. Chest leaders took the request under advisement.

Backers of the plan said that such an agency would be operated as a liaison body between Protestant churches of the city and existing social agencies. It would work particularly on the problems of divorce and juvenile delinquency.

STEPHEN E. KEELER
The Bishop of Minnesota

I have been reading THE WITNESS with increasing interest in these past few months. You certainly are bringing to the attenton of the Church a great many matters of prime importance. What a shame it is that we do not have a larger number of our Church people reading a paper like THE WITNESS that has so much to give.

MATTHEW C. HOWARD
Layman of New York

I was impressed by the article on present day problems by Bishop Scarlett of Missouri (WITNESS, April 18). As a layman who has remained loyal to the Church of my up-bringing, I often wonder whether or not the clergy are quite aware of how indifferent most people are to the Church these days. This is true I think particularly of young people. And when I hear them express an opinion at all they say that the Church is reactionary, out of date, cowardly. Surely no one could say this of the fine program for Christian social action set forth by Bishop Scarlett. I only wish I could believe that he is representative of the Churches as a whole.

MRS. H. J. JOHNS
Churchwoman of Boston

Your editorial Committed to Your Charge (WITNESS April 25) was well done and I am sure met a good many existing situations in parishes. Being rather elderly I have been a communicant of a number of parishes, both big and small. And on at least two occasions I have seen the work of fine young priests made extremely difficult because former rectors accepted invitations to return for weddings, funerals, parish functions. When a man leaves a parish he should keep hands off.

F. K. HOWARD
Retired Priest of California

The Editors:

Thank you for the article "The Cost of Pensions" (WITNESS, April 25) which dealt quite fully on many aspects of clergy pensions. I would suggest that since the high cost of living bears hardest on clergy with no other incomes than their pension, with occasional stipends for occasional ministrations now permitted by the Pension Fund, they be permitted to officiate regularly in such small missions which otherwise could not afford a resident priest.

In California, and probably in other parts of the U. S., retired clergymen might thus supplement their pensions and be resident pastors in small missions which can not afford to pay living salaries without depriving younger clergy of any pastorate. As it is, some missions and some retired ministers have to go without what might benefit both a mission and a clergyman.

While the General Convention is considering the needs of the Pension Fund and the ability to meet them, one retired priest at least, would ask that depriving qualified clergy from regular ministry simply for the crime of being sixty-eight is an injustice both to vacant missions and to retired clergy still able to do most of the work for which they were ordained.

Sons of clergymen know that we are better cared for than were our fathers before the creation of the Pension Fund so I would not wish to find fault but only to make a few handsome suggestions.

Bishop Barnwell of Georgia Urges Race Equality

Declares that Churchmen Need to Develop New Christian Open-Mindedness on Problems

By Julia St. Clair Moore

Savannah, Ga.:—Following a forward-looking address by Bishop Middleton S. Barnwell, the convention of the diocese of Georgia, meeting here at St. Paul's, May 7-8, unanimously approved a resolution recommending that the constitution of the diocese be changed to give Negroes equal representation, constitutional rights and convention privileges. The change will have to be presented at the 1947 convention before it is final. At present Negro Churchmen have their own Council, with a small representation at the diocesan convention.

The convention also authorized Bishop Barnwell to wire President Truman asking that rationing be reinstated in order that direct relief may be secured for the hungry people of the world.

After declaring that "there are exactly four dioceses which still discriminate against the Negro in official Church life, the two dioceses in South Carolina, Arkansas and Georgia," Bishop Barnwell made an eloquent plea for the end of discrimination, declaring that "I would not like Georgia to be the last to move in this direction." He said that the Negro is proud of his citizenship, anxious to learn and has judgment that can be trusted.

"If there is any danger in the present situation," declared the Bishop, "it does not lie with the Negro. Beyond a doubt the most dangerous element in the present situation are those political demagogues who are trying to ride to office on the platform of racial supremacy or race hatred. The racial hatreds which I hear preached today are coming from the lips of white men and not colored men, and this is something which fair and Christian people should well consider." The bishop then asked what the answer is if the contention be true that the Negro is not fit for citizenship. "The answer to this whole Negro question," he said, "is not more race discrimination and oppression. To say so is to deny the basic truths of citizenship, democracy and Christianity. The answer is more and better churches; more and better schools; more and better efforts to understand him as a human being in darkness reaching for the sunlight. Unless we give ourselves to the furtherance of such an effort we are false, I believe, to both man and God."

"Bear in mind," continued the bishop, "I am not advocating citizenship for the Negro. I regret to say that I did very little to bring it to birth. I am not advocating it for it is already here. I am merely recognizing it, and telling you how I think the present situation can best be handled."

Reviewing the changes that the war has wrought in the world Bishop Barnwell opened his address by quoting scripture which emphasized the life span of man and the everlastingness of God. "War," he then went on to say, "is human hatreds raised to their highest earthly power," and declared that there is no life in hatred. He turned to the plight of the starving throughout the world and the measures advocated to alleviate these conditions. "These local decisions," he said, "are no more than generous gestures . . . I can think of only two things we can do. One is to pray for the starving people of the world. This we can do as individuals. As a corporate body we can wire our President to put us back on rationing, so that the hungry of the world may be fed." Continuing he said: "It is too big a problem for any parish or diocese to handle alone. It must be done on a national basis or not at all." Toward this end the bishop said he would appoint a committee to consider this and other matters brought up in the address.

Pursuing the outline of the changes which have developed the bishop said: "Our old separatist attitudes have suddenly become as obsolete as the covered wagon and to all of these world-wide problems of race there must be a whole new way of approach." Race problems, economic inequalities and injustices and world political matters were the three basic considerations which face the world today. "On the one side stand love and life; on the other hatred and death. There is no third choice, and there is no compromise. We must choose this day whom we will serve. The leaders of our nations are gathered in New York today trying to make this one world fit to live in. That is the job of the state. But the state is powerless unless the Church does its job, which is to make people fit to live in one world. There is the heart of the matter. We are trying to carry over our jungle-mindedness and our jungle-heartness into the new day and God says 'no.' It does no good to change the plan of world order unless we change the hearts of men everywhere."

Bringing the problem down to the Church in Georgia, Bishop Barnwell advocated individuals attempting to influence governmental representatives for good. "Conservative and unselfish people are not organized for political pressures. It would be a good thing if they were," he said. "Our own Church has never been politically minded . . . and I believe that the time is at hand when we should become more so . . . In the realm of economics we can begin by being kind and just to our servants, to our employes . . . In the realm of economics we can study our own personal budgets and set aside a fair share for the work of God in this world . . . In the realm of race, we have, at long last, got to face up to the problems of the white man and the black man living side by side . . . In this we have got to develop a new sort of Christian open-mindedness."

HENRY SLOAN COFFIN AT CATHEDRAL

By Charles D. Kean

St. Louis:—Some definite commitment toward the achievement of organic union between the Episcopal Church and the Presbyterian Church must be made at the General Convention of the Episcopal Church in Philadelphia or the negotiations will fail, the Rev. Henry Sloan Coffin, former president of Union Theological Seminary, New York, and former moderator of the Presbyterian Church, told a mass union service in Christ Church Cathedral on Sunday evening, May 12.

"The crucial time is the next Convention," Dr. Coffin said. "If there is no definite approval of the commission's report, the negotiations will fail, because we will have to believe that you have thought better (or worse) of the matter. If we allow this thing to fail, we will have done the most disheartening thing possible to the ecumenical cause.

The issue is of vital importance, the speaker explained "because we have said to the world that we are going to achieve organic union. The whole Church of God throughout the world has heard of it." He cited the interest taken in the negotiations by the interchurch committee of the Church of Scotland and by the late Archbishop Temple.

In the course of his address, for which he used the resolution passed at the Cincinnati General Convention as a text, Dr. Coffin reviewed in a general way the salient points of the forthcoming report. He explained that publication has been delayed at the request of the Presbyterian negotiators, since it was not completed until recently, and there was no time to study it before the annual meeting of the General Assembly.

The union service was conducted by Bishop Scarlett, assisted by the moderator of the Presbyterian Church, the Rev. William B. Lampe, of St. Louis; the moderator of the St. Louis Presbytery, the Rev. Harvey M. Throop; the pastor of the influential Second Presbyterian Church, the Rev. Dr. James Clarke, and the Dean of Christ Church Cathedral, the Very Rev. Sidney E. Sweet. The combined choirs of the Cathedral and the Second Church provided the music.

As a gesture of brotherhood, Bishop Scarlett escorted Dr. Lampe to his bishop's chair and seated the Presbyterian moderator there for the service. Dr. Lampe pronounced the blessing at the conclusion.

PENNSYLVANIA HAS CONVENTION

Philadelphia:—Bishop Hart reported to the convention of Pennsylvania, meeting at Holy Trinity, May 6-7, that the diocese has raised $41,000 more than its goal of $500,000 for the R. & A. fund. There was considerable discussion on fair employment practice, with the following resolution adopted: "We deplore and condemn discrimination against a man who makes application for employment and is refused solely on the basis that he is a member of a racial or religious group. Both our religious responsibility and morality demand that we begin with ourselves as Christian members of our society by examining our own employment policies and those throughout the country, and take steps to bring about equal job opportunity without religious or racial discrimination."

The following were elected to General Convention; clergy: N. B. Groton, Frank E. Salmon, James M. Niblo, Charles E. Tuke. Laymen: Samuel H. Houston, Thomas B. K. Ringe, Owen J. Roberts, Spencer Ervin. The alternates: clergy: Stanley V. Wilcox, Herbert N. Caley, H. Taggart Steel, John K. Shryock. Laymen: Edward Clay, C. C. Morris, P. H. Grainger, E. L. VanRoden.

CONVENTION OF KANSAS

Topeka, Kan.:—The convention of Kansas approved a recommendation by Bishop Goodrich Fenner whereby he will request $5 each for the next ten years from the 2,000 communicants to be used as an extension fund. Elected deputies to General Convention: clergy: Carl W. Nau, Samuel E. West, Frederick Litchman, W. J. Heilman. Laymen: H. O. Bullock, W. M. Beall, H. R. Glover, Charles Hire. Alternates: clergy: John W. Day, Samuel McPhetres, Earl O. Minturn, Samuel E. West Jr. Laymen: Charles Rosencrance, J. R. Pritchard, Jack Juhl, Harry Revercomb.

One of the great institutions of the Church is the Voorhees School at Denmark, South Carolina. It is accredited by the state's department of education and by the Southern Association of Secondary Schools and Colleges. It is ably led by Dr. J. E. Blanton, the principal. Conference Approves Union With Presbyterians

Speaker Says Differences Between Churches Looks Like Jurisdictional Strike in Labor

By Sarah Dill

Louisville, Ky.:—Unanimous support for definite forward steps toward organic union with the Presbyterian Church was voted by the clergymen and laymen, representing thirteen dioceses, who attended the central conference of the Episcopal Evangelical Fellowship at Christ Church Cathedral here, May 7-8. The conference also went on record as favoring greater liberalization of the marriage canon than that provided for in the report of the joint commission on holy matrimony.

The following resolution, prepared by a committee composed of Bishop Tucker, of Ohio, the Rev. Frank Moore of Cincinnati, and Prof. Sherman E. Johnson of the Episcopal Theological Seminary, Cambridge, was unanimously adopted: "Whereas the Protestant Episcopal Church in General Convention at Cincinnati in 1937 invited the Presbyterian Church to join in a declaration of purpose to achieve organic unity, and whereas since that time a commission appointed by General Convention has been working with a commission appointed by the Presbyterian General Assembly on a basis of union agreeable to both Churches, which basis will be presented before General Convention meeting in Philadelphia in September, 1946, be it hereby resolved that this conference of the Episcopal Evangelical Fellowship declares itself in favor of mutual recognition of the ministries of the two churches, and looks for definite forward action by General Convention leading to organic union."

The conference action followed a session on Church unity under the chairmanship of the Dean, Sidney E. Sweet, of Christ Church Cathedral, St. Louis, at which the speakers were the Rev. Sherman E. Johnson and the Rev. Charles D. Kean, rector of Grace Church, Kirkwood.

"To the man in the street this union will prove that Christianity has more cohesiveness than he has dared to hope for," Prof. Johnson declared. He began by pointing out that to the world many of the differences between the Churches looked like a jurisdictional strike in the labor field—where there may be reasons, yet to the public there is evidence of something fundamentally wrong with the set-up. "No Protestant group—Presbyterian, Methodist or Lutheran—can take seriously any approach to unity which would mean a repudiation of their orders, when their ministries have been so signally blessed spiritually," the speaker said. He concluded by declaring that "everything depends on how earnestly the rank and file of the two Churches demand such a union."

In his remarks, Mr. Kean stated that the negotiations for unity with the Presbyterians provided a specific and concrete opportunity to re-affirm a Protestant conception of the Church and the ministry. Such a conception, where authority resided in "the fellowship of the faith" provided for a Church which might be relevant to the needs of the modern world. The desire for the safeguarding of authoritarian claims, he said, was evidence of a psychological desire for moral security at the price of historic relevance.

Dean Chester Emerson of Trinity Cathedral, Cleveland, presided at the session on the marriage canon, with the speakers Bishop William Scarlett of Missouri, and Prof. Oscar Seitz of Bexley Hall. Bishop Scarlett, who has been a member of the commission on holy matrimony for 21 years, said that the canon proposed at the Denver convention in 1931 was the best prepared by the commission. Under this canon, the only concern of the bishop and his court was with the proposed not with the previous marriage. Bishop Scarlett said that Section 9 of Canon 17, in the present report, opened the door to annulment. The issue, he said, must be facts which now exist, arising after the marriage which has broken. He regretted that the canons proposed were not stronger in their liberal emphasis, but hoped that the report would be considered by Convention rather than being by-passed in committee.

Prof. Seitz in a review of the New Testament position on marriage, began by sharply criticizing the findings of the Rev. Felix Cirlot in his book, "Christ and Divorce." After reviewing all of the disputed passages, he declared "Christ's teachings were never expected to be new law." Pointing to the present canon, Seitz declared that "it represented the type of the most legalistic rabbinical school, and cannot be held to represent the mind of Christ. The marriage of a divorced person is not the one unpardonable sin. The Church's doctrine of forgiveness does not come to an end with divorce. Christ taught the positive ideal of Christian marriage and of all Christian social relations—the ideal of love."

Bishop Charles Clingman of Kentucky, presided at the conference dinner at the Pendennis Club, where the speakers were Bishop Beverly D. Tucker of Ohio, and the Rev. Frank Caldwell, president of the Louisville Presbyterian Seminary. Dr. Caldwell expressed the hope that the basis for unity of the two Churches might be in an evangelical faith—"A Christian concept of eternal life to captivate the imaginations of men and move their wills to know him."

Chester Emerson, dean of Trinity Cathedral, Cleveland, lead the discussion on marriage and divorce at conference held at the cathedral in Louisville

In his address, which was the keynote of the conference, Bishop Tucker used as his text an address by the late Roswell Page of Virginia, made at the time the Atlantic City General Convention defeated a move to delete the name Protestant from the Church's title. He described the evangelical spirit as "a personal relationship to Christ rather than through the corporate experience of the sacraments"; "moral earnestness of purpose, reflected in social concern"; "uncompromising simplicity in worship, and a liberal direction in Church discipline"; "continued missionary idealism."

Bishop Tucker stated that the cause of the Episcopal Church in America had been retarded by the tacit division of missionary responsibility which entrusted domestic missions to the "high churchmen" and gave the foreign field to the evangelicals.

Bishop Richard A. Kirchhoffer of Indianapolis presided at the closing session on the Evangelical Co-operation, where the speakers were the Rev. J. Clemens Kolb, chaplain of the University of Pennsylvania, who asked for a strengthening of the appreciation of the evangelical heritage among young people, and a uniting of scattered efforts dissipated among various organizations and publications, and the Rev. William H. Marmion, rector of St. Mary's-in-the-Highlands, Birmingham, Alabama, who declared that every member of the conference must be "a committee of one to spread the evangelical spirit."

Bishop Kirchhoffer officiated at the opening service in Christ Church Cathedral, while Bishop Clingman, assisted by Dean Norvell E. Wicker of Christ Church Cathedral, celebrated the corporate communion of the conference.

NEW HAMPSHIRE DEPUTIES

Nashua, N. H.:—The following were elected deputies to General Convention at the convention of the diocese of New Hampshire, held here at the Good Shepherd: clergy: Robert H. Dunn, Elsom Eldridge, Clinton L. Morrill, Norman B. Nash. Laymen: Elmer M. Anderson, John R. Spring, H. K. Davison, Russell Eckloff.

By a large majority the report of the commission on marriage was approved. Action was also taken by the convention to increase the salaries of the lower paid clergy.

LECTURES AT PACIFIC

Berkeley, Calif.:—Canon C. Rankin Barnes of San Diego delivered a series of lectures on social aspects of pastoral care at the Church Divinity School of the Pacific, April 29-May 3. He gave detailed attention to the Church's concern with marriage, parenthood, the family. Discussing the child as a member of the family Canon Barnes listed the child's fundamental needs as security and development. If the child's need for security is not met in early life he is likely to crave it rather than development during adolescence, when he should be bridging the gap between childhood and adulthood. The child's measure of a good family lies in its attitudes and harmony rather than its size or conveniences.

Canon Barnes' final lecture, parish family counseling, emphasized the fact that the priest is obliged to counsel whether he wishes to or not. Parishioners assume his ability to counsel wisely from the very day of his ordination. Skilled counseling depends on knowledge of available resources, an understanding of human nature, and the emotional maturity of the counselor. The effective counselor, respecting the individual's personal autonomy, seeks to release his inherent potentialities for growth.

CHURCHMEN IN THE NEWS: *the Rev. William B. Sperry, social service secretary of the Detroit Council of Churches, starts a movement for better Church-Labor understanding: Canon Rankin Barnes of San Diego gives popular lectures on pastoral work at the Pacific Seminary: the Rev. BIG MUSCLE BOYS HAVE FAILED

Providence: — The "big-muscle boys" who for years tried to run a prison on the old eye-for-an-eye basis have all failed, according to Warden Cranor of the Rhode Island state prison, speaking at the annual dinner of the diocesan social service department. The objective of the modern penologist is not to praise or coddle the criminal, but to explore and develop his personality to the end that he may ultimately make a happy and healthy adjustment to the society against which he had transgressed. Only one man in 100 needs "extreme" care. The other 99 are "capable of being explored and developed." Tracing the history of the advancement of penological thought in the state and nation, Warden Cranor asserted reform in Rhode Island has been "spotty."

"The prison is a salvage depot and 'you can't throw away human lives in the junk heap'," the warden declared.

At the request of the state department of public welfare, Canon Richard Lief, executive director of the department, recently testified before the committee on ways and means of Congress on behalf of the Forand Bill which seeks to increase public assistance to the states. Canon Lief stated before the committee that he was not interested in "a chicken in every pot" but an opportunity for every individual to rise above a sub-standard existence.

COUNSELING PROGRAM IS URGED

Buffalo:—A program of counseling as a responsibility of every parish was advocated on May 22 at a meeting of the Church Mission of Help held here at the diocesan house. The speaker was the Rev. Joseph F. Fletcher of the faculty of the Episcopal Theological School. The meeting was held in connection with the Church conference of social work.

ORGANIC UNITY APPROVED

Macon, Ga.:—The convention of the diocese of Atlanta, meeting here May 8, unanimously adopted a resolution favoring organic union with the Presbyterian Church. A commission of the diocese was also appointed by Bishop Walker, acting on the resolution, to study any proposals offered on the subject. Members of the commission are the Rev. R. E. Fuessle, the Rev. J. Milton Richardson, the Rev. Joseph T. Walker, Mr. W. C. Turpin Jr., Mr. E. L. Sterne and Dr. H. E. Finley.

EDITORIALS

Statement of Policy II

WE BELIEVE that Christian reunion is essential to the further progress of Christ's Church. We have seen Christianity disunited and divided for four hundred years, and losing the battle with secularity and sin. How can an army advance upon the foe when some divisions are quarreling with other divisions, regiments with other regiments, and batteries are firing not at the enemy but at their own comrades at arms? That is what the Christian Churches are doing: and compared with the middle ages—even with the middle ages which were far from perfect—there has been a steady decline in the influence of the Christian religion for four hundred years.

The Reformation was a beginning but got side-tracked into a division of the Church, with consequent paralysis and ineffectiveness. It is even conceivable that the recent world war centering in Europe could not have broken out if the Christian Church had been united. For the most urgent of social reasons, then, and in the interest of the welfare of society if not of the preservation of the Church itself, we hold that Christian Reunion is indispensable.

There are a good many persons who will grant this in theory, but who will hedge the minute any concrete proposals are advanced. The proposed reunion with Presbyterians, for example—they knew too much about the First Presbyterian Church of Middletown, where they grew up, ever to want to see Presbyterians and Episcopalians united. The Presbyterians used to have winter revivals, with Billy Sunday or someone like him attacking the formal and ritualistic services of the Prayer Book, and twitting Episcopalians about their lack of real red-hot religion of the evangelistic type—surely, no one can think of combining the Presbyterians and the Episcopalians! Well, if that is all it amounts to, we, too, think it hopeless—or rather, not worth trying. But when we say reunion, we mean the realization of something not yet achieved in the world: a united, positive, convinced, tolerant, and free type of inclusiveness or of catholicity, which will have room for all that is positive and good in every Church, and will rule out only what is narrow, bigoted, divisive, and antagonistic to other Christians or Christian groups. This does not mean a "lowest common denominator" religion, based on the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, for example; it means the recovery of what is sound and good in the past, and the sloughing off of what is transitory, unfruitful, ineffective and positively harmful. For example, much of the bitterness of ancient theological controversy was animated by political antagonism, or by economic rivalry or by silly class-consciousness; but is there any reason under heaven why we in twentieth century America should perpetuate those old, bitter rivalries and hatreds?

To be specific, we believe that there ought to be a grass roots movement toward reunion. Too much of the work of the commission on approaches to unity has been spent in drafting plans for the eventually - to - be - reunited Church . . . as if nothing could be done until we are fully agreed upon that. But in the meantime, if the Church is really interested, there is much that can be done. We can engage in common worship, social work, education.

Meanwhile the Presbyterians have come more than half way to meet us; and unless something definite is done in the direction of reunion at the coming General Convention we believe that the Presbyterians will be entirely justified if they break off further negotiations altogether.

We believe also that the Episcopal Church should keep up its membership in the Federal Council of Churches and should support fully the World Council of Churches.

This is the second of a series of statements setting forth the editorial policies of The Witness. The views are composite and reflect a consensus of the editors and the executive committee of the Church Publishing Association.

"QUOTES"

THE most discussed question to come before General Convention has to do with progress of union with the Presbyterians . . . I do repeat my deep interest in this matter. When I think of the terrible realities of our world situation I am convinced of the absolute necessity of a united Christian voice. Here is an opportunity to make a beginning. Even this beginning will take time, patience, education and association between the clergy and laity of the two Churches. But if we who share the experience of Christ cannot resolve our differences how can we expect the nations to do so? I trust that the General Convention will take steps to forward this movement toward unity.

An Encouraging Decade

THE parish clergy last week received in the mail a copy of a brochure by the Rev. Walter H. Stowe, issued by the Church Historical Society. The statistics on church membership therein contained are carefully collected and meticulously analyzed in a fair and objective manner. The total picture is indeed encouraging. We would however make the following comments:

This report is based on parish statistics which are almost universally unreliable. An outstanding instance is that of a church which was listed annually in the Living Church as one of the ten largest parishes in the Protestant Episcopal Church. Its neighborhood had had a great boom a generation ago and has slowly declined since. Many communicants moved to the suburbs. It was almost impossible to secure a transfer. Two years ago, at the height of its statistical glory, the place was closed. It was practically empty.

In other parishes, because people are often less ostentatious about leaving than they are in coming in, the figures are added to yearly by the number of those confirmed, minus those communicants who happen to be buried at the church. Without continual pruning all lists become padded, unintentionally but none the less really. Often a conscientious new rector has to decimate his parish lists in his first year.

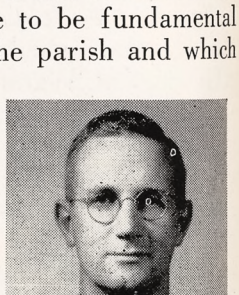
There is also the subtle pressure of personal and parochial ambition. In one city two churches were practically twins in size, opportunity and facilities. The parishioners of both were zealous and jealous. One had an advantage . . . a parishioner who worked in the diocesan office. Figures from that parish were invariably just a bit larger than those from the other. The rector, so we were told, got another, bigger, job largely on the strength of those imposing statistics.

Duplication undoubtedly occurs when men of substance have homes in more than one locality. They are made parishioners, even vestrymen, in more than one parish.

It would help slightly to have a per capita tax as they do in the Presbyterian Church, but this would have to be kept low in the interests of democracy.

The fact that restriction of immigration has helped our Church increase faster in proportion to the increase of the whole population is undoubtedly true. We regret that it seems to be a source of satisfaction, rather than of penitence. We are failing both as an Evangelical Church and as a Catholic one when we can and do appeal only to one racial stock.

Along with this pamphlet was a beautifully worked out diagram of the history of the Holy Catholic Church. Here we view the Church as a tree, with the Anglican, Orthodox and Roman branches. The Presbyterian, Methodist and Lutheran Churches are to be found as broken-off and apparently unblossoming twiglets. They are not portrayed very prominently. This reminds us of a similar piece of work put out by the Lutherans. You may find it in the excellent and colorful books of the Augsburg Press. Book V is Church history as seen by very intelligent "high Church" Lutherans. The difference in their diagram is that the Lutherans share the main place with the Roman and Orthodox Churches, and the Protestant Churches are grouped under the Presbyterian, Reformed and Anglican splits. The Anglican aberration is shown up for its divisive nature by being further split up into the Methodist, Congregational, Unitarian and Reformed Episcopal twiglets.



Now we know why historians and accountants should yearn for heaven. They will have plenty to do there, helping the recording angel in keeping things straight.

Strategy and Tactics
For the Parish

By

FRANCIS O. AYERS, JR.
Rector of St. John's, Waterbury, Connecticut

LAST week I wrote about the purpose of the parish. This week I would like to state a second assumption which I take to be fundamental to Strategy and Tactics for the parish and which will receive a good deal of attention in this column. It is that the future of the parish depends on the activity and leadership of laypeople.

There is nothing new in this point of view, nor does it lack for advocates, and yet as a rule lay activity and leadership are so limited as to be almost non-existent. The trouble is that many of the clergy who exhort the laity to action really look upon laymen very much as some look upon the Russians—sit with them on the councils, make a show of treating them as equals, but keep them ringed about with B-29s and atom bombs. Even laymen themselves, when they serve on committees on lay work, tend to limit their endeavors to such jobs as lay reading and canvassing which are important but only a very small part of the total job.

Laymen should not work for the Church but as the Church in every area of life. In one sense, as members of the body of Christ, it is impossible for them to act in any other way. Non-believers are quick to sense this and judge the Church accordingly. Needless to say the Church has a great deal of work to do; it must worship, it must pray, it must prophesy, it must serve, it must bring men to repentance; and it can do none of these without the activity and leadership of laypeople. Except for a few jobs committed to the clergy all the work of the Church has to be done by laymen. Furthermore I am sure that very often the layman's job takes more courage, understanding and faith. It is usually easy and safe to witness to Christ in a pulpit compared to witnessing to him in a director's or shop steward's meeting.

There are fortunately parishes which have done a grand job in stimulating the activity and leadership of laypeople and the rest of us can learn from them. St. George's (New York City), for instance, has done an outstanding piece of work. I hope to get some of the laymen as well as rectors of such churches to write for this column. I am sure that there have been other fine but little known experiments in this field and I would be glad to hear from you about them.

It is a great misfortune that very little has been written along these lines. There are however two excellent articles, one by the late Archbishop Temple entitled "You Are His Apostle" and addressed to laymen (published, I think, by the Presiding Bishop's committee on laymen's work). The other is by the Rev. Joseph F. Fletcher, entitled "The Ministry of the Laity" and addressed to clergymen (obtainable for ten cents from the Episcopal Theological School Alumni Association, 1 Garden Street, Cambridge 38, Massachusetts).

New Books

Excellent Good *Fair

*Pioneers for Peace Through Religion by Charles S. Macfarland. Fleming H. Revell Co. $2.50.

The author, formerly secretary of the Federal Council of Churches, presents with scholarship and understanding the religious movement for peace, particularly as it has been furthered by the Church Peace Union. He records the story of its ventures into new fields; of how it was instrumental in helping to establish such organizations as the World Council of Churches and the World Alliance, about which Henry Atkinson writes in this number.

The book shows that an unfettered, free organization, working with religious groups, can accomplish things that would be arrived at much more slowly by official Church groups. Those who realize that the winning of the peace is the great task before the world today will be encouraged by this graphic story of this organization founded by Mr. Andrew Carnegie.

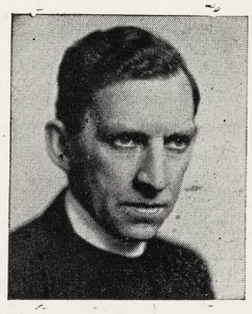
*A *Christian Global Strategy by Walter Van Kirk. Willet, Clark & Co., $2.00.



Must reading for all who would transform the Christian church from a storm cellar, museum and country club. The author contrasts the geopolitics of Haushofer with the geopolitics of Jesus and then elaborates a program and a strategy for winning the world to Christ before catastrophe overtakes us. Obstacles in the way, such as racial, creedal and class divisions are dealt with fairly and forcefully. The author's treatment of the rising tension between Romanism and Protestantism is particularly good. He attributes much of the present ineffectiveness of Protestantism both to an unwillingness to cooperate on certain specific projects and also to Protestantism's inferiority complex. Good reading for every Protestant and particularly for every sectarian.

Talking It Over

By
W. B. SPOFFORD

OTTO A. PIPER came to this country a few years ago from Germany and is now a professor at Princeton Theological Seminary. The other day he went to trouble and expense as a "minister of the Word of God," as he describes himself, to pour forth the most vicious blast against the Soviet Union that has come to my attention, even in these days of bigger and better blasts. Nor does he limit himself to the Soviet Union. Coupled with that ally in his three and a half page, single spaced document, is Czechoslovakia and Poland. These nations, according to the professor, are perpetrating "deeds no less fiendish and inhuman than those of the Nazis." He declares, always without a line of proof, that "all the horrors that Hitler's concentration camps revealed to the allied armies can now be found everywhere in Eastern Europe where Germans live." Indeed it is his claim that the very same concentration camps of the Nazis "are now used by Czechs and Poles and Russians, and the interned Germans die at the same speedy rate in the stadium of Prague, in Auschwitz and Myslowicze as did the Jews and the opponents of the Nazis until a year ago."

But it is "the tragic fate of German womanhood" that brings forth eloquence, with Americans denounced for our indifference to "the beastly raping of practically all the German women who came into view of the Russian army and the Polish militia." "Practically all German women" covers a lot of territory, but the good man of God does not limit himself to them. He condemns Americans also for "remaining callous when thousands of German children have their tender bodies lacerated by the perversity and unrestrained lust of the Russian soldiery" and affirms that "the sanctity of voluntary chastity in holy women was violated" and declares that "nuns and deaconesses only escaped this shameful fate who by their resistance moved the enraged assailants to kill them."

The man should see a psychiatrist.

Just what the former German professor, so worried about the "international prestige" of the country of his adoption, wants us to do about his unsubstantiated charges is not made clear. My hunch is that he will be quite satisfied if he can get a few simple people to accept his lie that "the leaders of Russia, Poland and Czechoslovakia are guilty of the same crimes against international law and humanity as the Nazis' leaders."

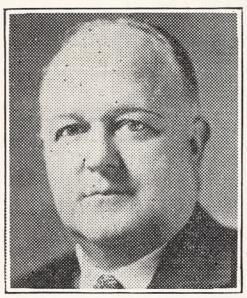
But I doubt if his Hitler "big lie" technique will work with many people. After all, raping "practically all of the women in Germany" is quite an accomplishment, even for three armies.

MORE subtle and dangerous is the piece of anti-Soviet propaganda called "Manchurian Manifesto" which was released on May 16 by a group of well-known people. This document affirms that China was forced to negotiate the treaty with Russia, under duress, and that "Russia has grossly violated the very treaty which China had been forced to negotiate under such unfavorable terms." It charges that the Russians are thieves and robbers; that they have armed the Chinese communists —a statement that is completely contrary to the testimony of first-hand observers like Edgar Snow, Col. Evans Carlson and others who have informed us that the communist forces in China had to fight the Japanese with hand-made arms and what little they could capture from the Japanese armies. The pay-off in this document is the familiar "iron curtain" gag whereby the outside world is supposed never to know what goes on behind the Soviet lines (no free press, etc., etc., etc. in Russia), but with the signers of this particular blast then setting forth in six pages of detail what they insist is going on. I wish they could make up their minds whether "the iron curtain" or "the horrible facts about Russia" is the better propaganda technique. They can't have it both ways.

But perhaps to list a few of the people who signed this statement is the easiest way to give you an idea what it is all about. William Henry Chamberlain is one of the top anti-Soviet propagandists in the world; the Hon. George H. Earle, who a couple of weeks ago over a national hookup handed out the let's-have-war-with-Russia-now line; Max Eastman, renegade communist; William Green, head of the A. F. of L., whose qualifications as an expert on China you can guess as well as I can. Then there is William Philip Simms, Scripps-Howard foreign editor and a Soviet hater —and, incidentally, invariably wrong in everything he predicts. Benjamin Stollberg is down— he's the fellow who went to Mexico some years ago for that fake trial designed to whitewash Trotsky, and who cost the Saturday Evening Post a lot of money by writing untruths about Prof. Jerome Davis. There is Norman Thomas, socialist, whose chief passion is hatred of Russia; Ossac Don Levine, also a Soviet-hater and said to be a ghost writer of books blasting Russia. And of course there's Clare Booth Luce, Sheen's gift to the Vatican.

There are a few parsons on the list, too: the Roman Catholic bishop of Buffalo, John P. Boland; the Rev. Wilfred Parsons, Jesuit; also our own William C. Kernan. Kernan is assistant at St. James-the-Less, Scarsdale, N.Y., but his chief occupation is being director of the Institute for American Democracy. In this capacity he has taken a good position on anti-Semitism, for which he is well paid, but he's screwy on about everything else in my opinion. Allowing his name to be used on this vicious document, as though he were an expert on Soviet-China relations about which I am sure he knows little, is a case in point.

There are other names but perhaps this is enough to give you the idea. It's poisonous stuff, making for war. The perpetrators ought to be tried as enemies of humanity, along with Piper, the minister-of-the-word-of-God from Princeton. But we have free speech and a free press in the USA so people have a right to pop-off, even if World War Three, with its atomic bomb, is the end result.



And I do mean End Result.

Creating the Will to Peace

by Henry A. Atkinson

THE World Alliance for International Friendship Through the Churches was created in Constance, Germany, in 1914, at almost the exact moment when the first world war began. Its twenty-fifth anniversary was observed at a meeting held in Geneva in 1939—just as the second world war began! Cynics might well be pardoned for suggesting that it is time to stop such an organization in the interest of preventing another world war! But, I think a sober appraisal of the work of the Alliance, both in America and Europe, will justify the confidence of the thousands of people connected with the organization.

It was only in the later years of the 19th century that any real progress was made toward the control of war. From the earliest days of man's life on earth, down to the present, war has been one of the principal occupations of human beings. Fighting wars, getting ready to fight wars, and recovering from wars, are all recognized as regular normal activities. It has been estimated that for the six thousand years of recorded history there have occurred about six thousand wars—one war for every year!
